FLORENCE MACARTHRY:

An Irish Tale.

BY

LADY MORGAN,

AUTHOR OF "FRANCE," "O'DONNEL," &C.

Know thus far forth:
By accident most strange, bountiful fortune,
Now, my dear lady, hath mine enemies
Brought to this shore: and by my prescience,
I find my zenith doth depend upon
A most auspicious star, whose influence,
If now I court not but omit, my fortunes
Will ever after droop.

VOL. I.

PUBLIC LIBRARY, CONDUIT STREET, HANOVER SQUARE.

The Irish have been accused of making an ostentatious display of their injuries, and of clanking their chains to excite compassion. But, however humiliating it may be deemed to re-iterate complaint where there is no commiseration, and to urge claims where there is no redress, the alternative is less intolerable than that silent acquiescence, which malice or self-interest is but too ready to construe into tacit approbation.

The appeal to public opinion belongs to the age in which we live; and it is the certainty of its ultimate success, not the abject hopelessness of its repetition, which has excited this affectation of disgust. The ratio ultima regum is too expensive an instrument to be often wielded by the citizen; nor is it very likely that the detractors of the Irish nation would be more satisfied with an overt act of resistance, than they are with the tameness of annual petitions.

But be that as it may, the 'national tale', with which the reader is here presented, is no pathetic appeal to public compassion. It is, indeed, impossible to speak of Ireland, still less to take it as the scene of a narrative, without frequent allusion to its starving, squalid, and diseased population. The people form too prominent an object in the landscape to be wholly passed over by the most indifferent observer. But it is chiefly from among the master cast that the author of Florence Macarthy has drawn her characters and her incidents; and it is in the reaction of the execrable system of 'divide and govern,' in the demoralization and insecurity which that system inflicts upon the agents, no less than on the victims of oppression, that she has found materials for another Irish story.

For the fidelity of her delineations, whoever has resided in Ireland will readily vouch; and if the features are sometimes deeply tragical, and sometimes broadly ludicrous, the fault lies in the originals, and not with their illustrator.

The manners she has described, and the society she has represented, belong to a peculiar epoch; they arose under a particular political combination, and they will cease with its dissolution. But wherever a possibility exists for bringing that combination again into action, the tale will have an interest: and as ridicule will reach those who are impregnable to reason, this picture of the aristocracy of the bureau may not be without a contingent utility to other countries, beside that for whose service it was more expressly undertaken.

In the composition of the series of tales, of which Florence Macarthy forms a part, the author has hitherto endeavoured to sketch the brilliant aspect of a people struggling with adversity, and by the delineation of national virtues, to excite sympathy, and awaken justice. In the portraiture of a party, a cast, a faction, the colouring must necessarily vary. The opposition between the natural characteristics of the Irish temperament, and those peculiarities, which a false policy, operating for six hundred years, has impressed upon a portion of the population, must not be confounded with contradiction in statement, or versatility in opinion: nor the Crawley family be taken as derogating from the Glorvinas, O'Donnels, and Mac Rorys, of former compositions.

CHAPTER I.

Whom when I asked, from what place he came,
And how he hight himself, he did y-cleep
The Shepherd of the Ocean, by name,
And said he came far from the main sea deep.

Collin Clout's come home again.—Spencer.

Early in the nineteenth century, in an autumnal month, a corvette, a light built Spanish vessel, passed the Bar of Dublin, and, with all her canvass crowded, rode gallantly into the bay, after having weathered, for a period of five days, one of those tremendous gales, which occasionally agitate the Irish seas. A southern port of Ireland had been her original destination. Stress of weather had driven her up the Channel; and the injury she had received in her unequal contest with the elements rendered it necessary that she should undergo repair, before she proceeded on her coasting voyage. On her stern she bore the name of "Il Librador;"* and, though now unarmed, and the property of a private individual, she had evidently been a sloop of war in some foreign service.

The dawn was breaking in tints of gold and hues of crimson, as the corvette cut her way through the brightening waves; and the happiest aspect of the Irish coast presented itself to the view of two persons, who stood in silence at the helm;—who had stood there since the first pale flush of light had thrown its silvery line along the eastern horizon.

The elder of the two was the master of the vessel. He was still in the very prime of life and flower of manhood; and as each lovely feature of the Irish shore gradually developed itself, and arose bright and fresh from the mists of the morning upon his eager gaze, he presented, in his own person, an image, that denoted the intention of the creator, when he made man supreme above all, to reign over his fair creation.

He stood erect, his arms so folded as to give to his square chest and shoulders a peculiar muscularity and breadth of outline. His fine bust, indicating extraordinary strength, would have been almost disproportioned to his stature, which rose not much above the middle height, but that the loftiness of his air, and the freedom of his carriage, conferred an artificial elevation on his figure, and corrected what might be deemed imperfect in his actual structure. His large eyes were rather deep set than protuberant; and their glances, rather side-long than direct, flashed from beneath his dark impending brows, like the vivid lightnings which fringe the massive vapours of a tropical atmosphere. His mouth had a physiognomy of its own: it was what the eye is to other faces: and the workings of the nether lip, in moments of emotion, indicated the influence of vehement passions, habitually combatted, though rarely subdued. The expression of his countenance was more intellectual than gracious, and calculated to strike, rather than to please. But his rare and singular smile (a smile so bland, it might well have become even a woman's lip) wholly changed its character; and the full displayed teeth, of splendid whiteness, produced perhaps even too strong a contrast with a complexion, which southern suns, and climes of scorching arbor, had bronzed into a dark, deep, but transparent olive. No tint, no hue warmed or varied this gloomy paleness, save when the tide of passion, rushing impetuously from the heart, coloured for a moment, with a burning crimson, the livid cheek, and then, as promptly ebbing back to its source, left all cold, pale, and dark as before.

From his accent or manner it would have been difficult to assign him to any particular country. He seemed rather to belong to the world;—one of those creatures formed out of the common mould, whom nature and circumstances combine and fit for deeds of general import and universal interest. Neither could the term gentility be appropriately applied to an appearance which had a character beyond it. He might have been above or below heraldic notices and genealogical distinctions, but he was evidently independent of them. His mate, an old but hale man, with whom he conversed in Spanish (but who had English enough to work the ship, and sufficient knowledge of the Irish seas to steer it with skill), respectfully addressed him by the title of "the Commodore;" and the crew (a few English sailors, to whom he seemed, even by name, a stranger) adopted the same appellation. But he issued his clear prompt orders with the air and decision of one to whom higher titles of command were familiar. He was a good sailor, fearless in danger, calm and self-possessed in difficulty; and, to the only passenger who accompanied him, (one courteously and accidentally admitted on board his ship), he spoke of himself as a man fond of the sea from boyhood, making voyages of pleasure when he could, and now uniting an old habit of recreation with the urgency of pressing business. He was on his way from a West India island, on a secret mission, of importance to himself; but he neither mentioned his own name, nor inquired that of the young passenger he had taken up out of a wherry in Plymouth Sound, the port whence he had last sailed, and where the stranger had vainly sought a passage to Ireland, now granted him by the commander of Il Labrador.

The appearance of this person, who had voluntarily announced himself by the name of De Vere, was less equivocal, and though infinitely interesting, was perhaps less striking than that of the Commodore. It was also of a more definite stamp and character; more assignable to a class, a cast, a country. Though there was little of conventional mannerism about him, though his elegant and thorough bred air was wholly unmarked by the overcharged fashioning of any country, yet, to those acquainted with the first class of British distinction, he was easily cognizable in accent, dress, air, and physiognomy, as an Englishman of rank and fashion, the homme comme il faut of the highest circles.

There was, however, in the countenance and modes of this distinguished young stranger something more than the mere characteristics of country and rank:—a sort of fantastic pensiveness, a real or affected abstraction, a something imaginative and ideal, in his manière d’être, that indicated great eccentricity, if not eminent peculiarity of mind. He seemed a compound of fancy and fashion; a medium between the consciousness of rank, and the assumption and possession of genius, which placed him out of the common muster-roll of society; something escaped from it by chance, and vain of standing aloof, untractable to its laws, and therefore believing himself beyond them. In his conversations with the Commodore he spoke in paradox, had systems out of the common scale, and theories of alenibicated refinement. An ideologist, in the fullest sense of the word, in his philosophy he talked as one who believed that "nothing is, but thinking makes it so:" and occupied by an ideal presence, he affected to live distinct and independent of all human interests.—The structure of his fine head was such as physiognomists assign to superior intellect; and the precise arrangement of its glossy auburn curls left it difficult to decide whether its fanciful and fashionable possessor was more fop or philosopher, dandy or poet. His valet de chambre, a Frenchman, presided with invariable punctuality at his toilette twice a-day, when the uncivil elements did not interfere with such arrangements; and the rest of his time was spent in musing, reading Spencer's "Fairy Queen," and "State of Ireland," and occasionally conversing with the commander of the vessel, who seemed to inspire him with sentiments of curiosity and admiration, not usual to his ordinary habits of feeling. As he now stood beside him at the helm, or rather leaned in a recumbent attitude, with an half-closed book in his hand, his attention seemed not to be given to the beautiful coast scenery, which, endowed with at least the charm of novelty, was now breaking on his view; for his up-turned glance, giving him the inspired air of one "communing with the skies," seemed to pursue the gradual disappearance of the morning star, as an object superiorly attractive in proportion as it was remote and fleeting.—After a long silence, mutually preserved, he withdrew his dazzled eyes from the reddening effulgence of the heavens, and addressed his companion, by observing:

"There is to me a singular attraction in the aspect of an unknown firmament, for it tells of distance from scenes, and objects long marked by sameness, and distinguished only by satiety."

"It tells too," replied the Commodore, "of remoteness from objects, precious by interest or habit. The cross of the south, first seen in tropical climates, draws tears to the eyes of the Spanish seaman, its image recalling remembrances of his distant country."
"Remembrances of country, however, are usually the finger-posts to ennui.—One wears out every thing in one's own country before one leaves it; and, therefore, it is left.—Country! all countries are alike: little masses of earth and water; where some swarms of human ants are destined to creep through their span of ephemeral existence; coming, they know not whence;—going, they know not where."

"These little masses of earth and water," said the Commodore, "are therefore precious and important to the ants that creep on them; and each little hill is dear to the swarm that inhabits it, as much from that very ignorance as from interest."

After a short pause, Mr. De Vere resumed:

"Can you not credit then the existence of a creature placed by nature or circumstances beyond the ordinary pale of humanity, shaking off 'his poor estate of man,' scarcely looking upon that spot, called earth, with human eyes, nor herding with his species in human sympathy—one so organized, so worked on by events, and thwarted in feelings, so blasted in his bud of life, as to stand alone in creation, matchless, or at least unmatched, whose joys, whose woes, whose sentiments and passions, are not those of other men, but all his own, beyond the reach of affection, or the delusions of hope?"

"A being, thus constituted," rejoined the Commodore, "could not be man. He, who wants the appetites and passions common to all men, with the sympathies and affections that spring from them, is something better or worse, angel or daemon, but he is not man."

"You deny then the possibility of such an existence?"

"Nay—madmen may fancy such a combination, poets feign it, or vain men affect it; but it has no real existence in nature or society. Man is always man; and he who pretends to be more, is rarely placed by nature at the head of his species—he is in fact usually less.”

Before Mr. De Vere could reply, a question from a sailor interrupted the conversation, which was one of many held in the same tone and spirit. The Commodore was the next moment busied in giving orders for tacking. He addressed his mate in pure Spanish, chided the French valet out of his way in good French, and fell foul of a lubberly sailor in broad nautical English.

“There is somewhere,” said Mr. De Vere, turning over the pages of Spencer’s Ireland, and resuming his conversation with the commander of the vessel, as he returned to his station at the helm—“there is somewhere, through the quaint pages of Spencer, an admirable description of the natural advantages of Ireland, which I cannot find."

"Look around you," answered the Commodore: "you will find them here."

"I prefer looking through the spectacles of books. I like the prismatic hues thrown by authorship upon places and facts."

"Indeed! that is strange! but in viewing Ireland through Spencer's pages, you will see it, as children do an eclipse, through a smoked glass. He was one of those, whose policy it was to revile the country he preyed upon, to spoil, and then to vituperate. No Englishman can fairly estimate this island who comes not unshackled by his own interests. Spencer, the deputy of a deputy, the secretary, whose servile flattery of the viceroy, his master, was rewarded with a principality (soon lost, indeed, but most unfairly won), is no author for impartiality to judge by; and when he stoops to eulogize the 'dreadless might' of his ferocious patron, Grey, one of Ireland's Herods, when he defines power to be

however he may please as a poet, he is contemptible as an historian, and infamous as a politician."

"Oh! as an historian or politician I give him up, because both characters are equally ridiculous: the politician always guided by prejudice and interest, the historian always immersed in ignorance and error. Time discovers and shames both: and thus it is with all that bears upon human facts. The imagination alone is always right; its visions are alone imperishable. The Fairy Queen of Spencer will thus survive, when his State of Ireland shall be wholly forgotten: and, for my own part, so much do I prefer the visions of his fancy to the historical relations of any period connected with the history of men, that I would go a thousand miles to visit the ruins of his Irish Kilcoleman,* where once

"He sat, as was his trade,
'Under the foot of Mole, that mountain hoar,' Where—' Allured by his pipe's delight,
'Whose pleasing sound y-shrilled far about,' the gallant Raleigh found him. But I am not sure that I would turn one point out of my way to tread upon the spot where legitimate despotism signed the fiat of its own destruction, and gave Magna Charta to an emancipated nation.

* Originally the principality of the Macarthies More; afterwards the palatinate of the Fitzgeralds, Earls of Desmond; forfeited by them, and given to new spoliators, among whom was the thriftless adventurer Raleigh, who in Ireland (*) acted the part of a freebooter. The spoils which fell to the poet Spencer, as secretary to Lord Arthur Grey, (the 'Sir Artigall' of his dreary legend of that name) were three thousand acres of rich land in the County of Cork, with the beautiful Castle of Kilcoleman, the seat of the Earls of Desmond.

The delicious strains of Spencer are now fresh and true as when they were first breathed; but where is the spirit that commanded and produced an English Magna Charta?"

"Suspended, perhaps," interrupted the Commodore, "not extinct. For its essence exists in the temperament of an Englishman. You must first give him another position on the globe, or employ ages of misrule to change his national character, before you can reconcile him to slavery—circumstances may lull him in false security, or force him to temporary acquiescence; but no combination can ensure his permanent obedience to unequivocal despotism."

The vessel at that moment touched the pier.

The Commodore had sprung upon land; and he stood for a moment on the spot that had received the first pressure of his footstep. To judge by the darkling of his eye, and the motion of his lip, some strong and powerful feeling occupied his mind; but it was of brief duration. Emotions unconnected with action seemed not made for him: by the tossing back of his head, he appeared to give thought to the winds, and plunged into all the bustle and activity of the circumstances in which he was placed.

The Holyhead packet was not yet visible; and the earliness of the hour left the pier still in quietude. The land-waiter had been called to go through the necessary forms, and of him the Commodore asked some questions, with eager curiosity, clearness, and rapidity of utterance, as if life were too short to suffer one moment to pass by unoccupied, or uninstructed; then, as if impatient of the drawling replies, anticipated the answers, and started new inquiries of local reference. Meantime Mr. De Vere had landed; but wholly abstracted from the noise and activity that surrounded him, he stood, turning over the leaves of his Spencer, while the valet was receiving parcels, portmanteaux, and portfolios, from a sailor, who was flinging them on shore, and exclaiming, as he appropriated or rejected each several article, "C'est à nous,"—"ce n'est pas à nous."—With the exception of "got dam," the Frenchman had not yet acquired a single word of English. But with this small portion of the language, and his own very expressive gesticulations, he had succeeded so well, as almost to think with Figaro, that this emphatic imprecation was the basis of the tongue; and that with it "on ne manque de rien, nulle part."

"Will I step in for a jingle for your honor?" demanded a voice, in the broad languid drawling of the genuine patois of Dublin, addressing the full force of its brogue to the delicate ears of Mr. De Vere. "Will I, plaze your honor, step in, Sir?" This question, several times repeated, at last obtained notice by its reiteration. The young stranger raised his eyes for a moment to the face of him who thus unceremoniously proffered his services, but he withdrew them again in disgust. The object of this ungracious glance, so little flattering in its expression, had stood its inquiry with great coolness. He was leaning, and had been leaning since the dawn, against one of the posts of the pier, and had watched the approach of Il Librador idly and patiently for more than an hour, partly for the gratification of his curiosity, and partly in the hope of earning some trifle by going for a vehicle, or by carrying into the town some luggage for the passengers. There is scarcely any place so lonely, or hour so unseasonable, at which some one of these genuine lazzaroni of the Irish metropolis may not be found lounging away time, between hope and idleness, in the enjoyment of doing nothing, or the vague expectation of having something to do.

Miserably clad, disgustingly filthy, squalid, meagre, and famished, the petitioner for employment had yet humour in his eye, and observation in his countenance. Occasionally ready to assist, and always prompt to flatter, he did neither gratuitously. Taunt and invective seemed the natural expression of his habit; for though debasingly acquiescent to a destiny, which left him without motive for industry, in a country where industry is no refuge from distress, he yet preserved the vindictiveness of conscious degradation; and there was frequently a deep-seated sincerity in his curse, which was sometimes wanting to his purchased benediction. Idleness had become the custom of his necessity; and his wants were so few, that a trifling exertion would supply them. Yet he sought early and late for employment; for he had probably wants more urgent than his own to satisfy.

This unfortunate representative of his class had hitherto loll’d on the pier, a listless spectator of the scene, which was going forward, muttering at intervals a shrewd observation, laughing deridingly as he threw his eyes over the French valet, whose foreign air and dress were peculiarly notable; and again composing his sharp features into a look of respectful deference, as he reiterated his question to him, whom he supposed the master.—"Will I step in for a jingle, your honor? will I, Sir?" "Step in!" at last repeated Mr. De Vere, struck perhaps by the calm steady perseverance of his intrusion—"step in where, friend?" "Step into Dublin, plaze your honor, for a jingle, Sir, or a hackney."

"Is Dublin so near then?"

"It is, plaze your honor, handy bye, Sir, quite convenient: yez wont miss me, your honor, till I bees back wid ye."

"If Dublin is so near," said Mr. De Vere, closing his book, and addressing the Commodore, who now, with his rapid step, approached him, after having given his orders to his mate and men—

"if Dublin is so near, I should prefer walking, to trusting to any filthy vehicle we may be able to procure at this unseasonable hour."

"I meant to propose it," was the reply; and the active animated speaker, taking a rich pelisse from his mate, which he drew over his ship dress, and exchanging his cap for a round hat, he gave some additional orders in Spanish, and desired the sailor, who stood beside him, with a large valise on his shoulder, and writing case in his hand, to follow him to Dublin. The two gentlemen then proceeded, arm in arm, to town, furnished by the officers of the customs with a card of one of the many hotels which now succeed in the patrician streets of Dublin to the mansions of the banished nobility.

Mr. De Vere, to whom the vulgar exertions of every-day life were all unknown, and even unguessed at, had left every thing to a valet, as helpless as himself. For the first time since he had come into his master's service, he was deprived of the assistance of a certain Portuguese laquais, one who spoke all languages, performed all services, and united all the intrigue, roguery, and ingenuity of the Pedrillos and Lazarillos of the Spanish comedy. This man had been dismissed for mal-practices, at the moment his master was leaving the port of Lisbon for that of Plymouth; and since that period the Frenchman had acted without deputy or interpreter. But as almost the whole of the interval had been passed at sea (for his master had remained but a few hours at Plymouth), he had but slightly felt the inconvenience. Now, however, left to act, not only for his master, but for himself, he remained, standing on the pier, in all the embarrass of endless books, parcels, and the splendid necessaire of the portable toilette. He had alternately taken up and laid down a valise, a dressing box, and a pocket edition of Zamora's Spanish Plays; accompanying each movement with a "sacre," "diantre," or "Peste de moname," slowly rolled forth from between his closed teeth; when the English sailor, jerking his own load on his shoulders, exclaimed, "come, come, mounseer, know your own mind; either wait till we sends a coach for you and your trumpery, or get some-un to help you."

"Shure I'll carry in them portman- tles to town for you, mounseer, and the leather box, to boot, for a trifle," observed the Irishman; who, disappointed in the commission he had sought, had remained motionless and silent, till the hope of his services being again accepted suggested itself; and he repeated his proposal three several times, each louder than the other, as if the louder he vociferated, the better chance he had of being understood by the foreigner.

"Do you hear me now, mounseer?" he screamed close in the Frenchman's ear; who, stamping his feet with anger, exclaimed, "Paix! paix!"

"Pay, pay," reiterated the Irishman. "I'll engage you will, dear, and well." Then, without further ceremony, hoisting the valise on his shoulders, taking a port folio under his arm, and carrying the dressing box by its handle, he nodded his head to the parcel of books, which were inclosed in a leather strap, observed, "now, mounseer, I'll trouble you just to take them bits of books in your daddle; and what would ail us, but we'd take in th' other trifles of things betwixt us aisy enough, plaze God; I'll engage we will. So now, my lad," (address-
"follow me, and I'll shew you the road."

The Frenchman comprehended the arrangements of the Irishman better than his language, grinned applause, muttered a good humoured "got dam," in token of approbation, and taking up the books, these three singular representatives of the three nations proceeded towards Dublin, following close on the steps of the gentlemen, who had inquired their route, and were some paces in advance.

The Irish lounging, no lounging now, stepped on lightly with his burthen, in that short quick trot, with which the lower Irish frequently perform journeys from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, bare-footed and bare-legged. The sailor and the Frenchman, with an appearance much more alert, and burthens infinitely lighter, scarcely kept pace with him, and obliged him frequently to stop, while he as frequently addressed them with a sort of sly indirect curiosity, which ingeniously sought its gratification, without any obvious efforts to obtain it.

"I'll engage, mounseer," he observed, first attacking the Frenchman, "yez were never in ould Ireland afore, far as you've travelled; and yez

"May travel the wide world all over,
And sail from France to Balin-robe," as the song says, afore ye'll see the likes of it again, any way." "Bon, bon," returned the Frenchman, supposing that he communicated the joyful intelligence of their speedy arrival, "Bon, j'en suis charmé."

"Why then it will _charmy_ ye more every step ye take, for there isn't her match, by say, or land, with her beautiful eye, there, like a unicorn's, in the front of her forehead;* and her Hills of Hoath, like a mole on her cheek; and see there forenent yez, across the bay, there, there's the sheds of Clontarf, and the green groves of Marino, the great Earl of Marlemont's sate, and ould Ballybough, the creatur! to the fore this day as when Bryan Børugh lost his crown, and his harp on it, (the sowl), in the Musaum of Trinity."

* Ireland's eye—a rock at the entrance of the bay.

"Comment done!" demanded the Frenchman, denoting his ignorance of this detailed description by the perplexity of his looks. "Och bother," returned the Irishman, out of all patience at what appeared to him obstinate stupidity.

"Bodere, dodere," reiterated the Frenchman, indignant at what he saw

* A harp is shewn in the Museum of Trinity College, said to have belonged to the Irish Monarch, and found on the Plains of Clontarf, where he fought his last famous battle against the Danes, and lost his life.
was intended for insult. "Comment donc bodere gueux, que tu es!"

"Cut away yourself," replied the Irishman, laughing good humouredly, "or troth, you'll be in too late for the fair, honey!"

The Frenchman, supposing that these words, and the conciliating laugh which accompanied them, indicated an apology, took off his hat with great politeness, and accepted the fancied excuses, with "mais voila, mon ami, qui est bien."

"Och, your humble servant to command, mounseer," returned the Irishman, dropping his load to make an imitative bow: "troth, you do your dancing master every justice, whoever he was."

The English sailor, much amused by this interchange of civility in his two companions, observed, "aye, aye, sirs: let the mounseers alone for bowing and scraping, and the likes. Never a dancing dog at Bartlemy fair will beat them at that, I'll warrant."
“Why then I’ll engage,” replied the Irishman, “that yellow, swarthy, portly gentleman there, your captain, wouldn’t be a Frenchman, with his eligant sur-tout, for all he has a Frenchified air about him.”

“What he! Lord help your heart, not he—no more a Frenchman nor I am, lad.”

“Och! he’d be very sorry, I’ll engage; though he has an outlandish look with him, for all that.”

“Why, aye sure, because he comed from the Hindies, d’ye see; the West Hindies,—or Spanish America.—It’s all one for that, come from where he will, he’s a hearty true blue, every bit of him.”

“And is yourself come all the ways with him, dear, from the Western Indies?”

“Not I. I was lying in dock, for it is not now all as one as formerly—all goes by luck and fashion now—Some how, one hears no more of the Howes, and the Hothams, and the Nelsons, and the wooden walls of old England.—The jacket, the old true blue's worn out, Sir. So this here gem'man, who owns that tight bit of timber, every splinter of her himself, it seems, put into our Plymouth Sound, three weeks ago, bound from Demerara, and sent back his Spanish crew in a Cadiz merchantman, (excepting old Grim Groudy, the mate), and paid 'em like a prince. So then he set sail for London, aloft on the mail; and when he came back, he manned this little vessel with a handful of us Plymouth boys, and we heaved anchor six days ago for Ireland; and this I'll say for him, a better commander never stepped on forecastle, or walked the quarter-deck."

"See that now," replied the Irishman, quietly, "and hasn't a mild look with him, then, for all that; only mighty stern. He wouldn't be a slave driver from the Western Indies, Sir, I suppose."
“What he! not he, bless the heart of him; no more nor I bees; not but he's hard enough, sometimes, and hates a lubber as he hates poison; but goes our halves in hard work.”

“See that, now, Sir: och, he has a fine look with him, and mighty portly; and has a great name upon him, if a body knew it, I'll engage.”

“Can't tell ye that though,” replied the sailor, because why, I don't know it myself. They called 'n the Don at the King's Arms in Plymouth—the Spanish Don, though he speaks as good English as the best. And then, when one asks a question of Grim Groudy, who knows all about him, he only answers one in his d—d lingo.”

“And that tall slender young man, dear, with his head in the clouds, as if he'd snuff the moon, fairly, he's his comrade, I'll engage?’

“What, yon fair weather, fresh water bird there? Mounseer's master—Oh,
I knows nothing of he, nor Commodore, nor mate either, for the matter o' that; he's a bird of passage, lad, a God send, d'y see. Why, just as we had given Edystone lighthouse the go-bye, out comes old Jack Andrews's wherry, the Shark, rowing at the rate of ten knots an hour; and when it came alongside the Librador, yon spark, there, stands bolt upright, and begs a passage for his self and our mounseer, here to Ireland, parlaverings about no packets plying from Plymouth to Dublin, and being in haste to get there. So the Commodore has him hauled up, and gives him the state cabin; a cabin fit for an English admiral; and so they've gone on well enough, yard arm and yard arm, jawing together. fore and aft, first in one lingo, and then in another; and what with mounseer there, that has not a word of English to throw to a dog, and the Spanish mate, who has bare sufficient to work the ship, why the vessel's like to the town of Babylon. But what's most oddest, is, that for all mounseer and Grim Groudy's gibberishing it so with their own masters, shiver me if they understand one another a bit. Ha! ha! ha!"

"Why then," returned the Irishman, "it is mighty odd, and very remarkable; for if foreigners wont understand one another, who do they expect will, I wonder.—And so yez are all going to put up in Dublin? Why then yez are in great luck."

"Luck! no such luck either; but needs must when the old one drives. Why, Sir, we have been pelted about this little basin of dirty water these five days, and last night were fairly driven up the Channel, blown to shivers, tattered to rags, and must now put into dock here, till all's made right and tight; and then we're under orders to weigh anchor with old Grim Groudy, and sail for Dungarvon."
"Troth, then, if yez will take a fool’s advice, yez will stay where ye are; for yez may go farther and fare worse than stopping in Dublin; only may be, your business does’nt lie here, Sir."

"Why, for business, I dont believe we have much business here; only just a voyage of pleasure. Why that’s all the go, now. The agreeablest trip I ever made was with a young Irish lord to the Mediterranean, just for sport like; round the world for sport."

"Why, then, its pretty sport that gives a man the say-sickness. But its ill winds blows nobody good; and only for it, sorrow bit of Ringsend yez had seen this day, and here it is."

The two gentlemen in advance had at this moment halted at the entrance of one of the most wretched suburbs that ever deformed or disgraced the metropolis of any country; and the Commodore, whose quick and often backglancing eye had long since discerned the reinforcement obtained to the party, by the addition of the loungers at the pier, now called, and desired him to lead the way. "I will, plague your honor," he replied, trotting briskly on, while the wearied Frenchman "toiled after him in vain;" and even the sailor made an exertion to keep pace with him. "I'll only just step in, Sir, by your leave, to get my morning, for I hasn't broke my fast yet, Sir."

"Broke his fast!" reiterated the Commodore, shrugging his shoulders, as he observed his newly constituted guide step in to a little shop, whose gaudy placard of "licensed to sell spirituous liquors" was further illustrated by a range of glasses on the counter, filled with whiskey. The guide tossed one off, observing to the dirty lazy-looking woman, who stood wiping a jug with her apron, "I'll pay you when I come back, Mrs. Hurley, dear." With this assurance from her wretched, but well-known customer, Mrs. Hurley appeared satisfied; aware, from experience, that, in this instance, punctuality was guaranteed by self-interest.

"Break his fast?" repeated the Commodore: "what a mode of breaking fast!"

"As good as any," replied Mr. De Vere: "it all comes to the same thing in the end. Habit and circumstances determine the mode and means without our consent or will; and gin or glory

'Leads but to the grave:'

The two travellers now followed their guide with difficulty through collected heaps of mud and filth. The very air they breathed was infected by noxious vapours, which the morning sun drew up from piles of putrid matter. The houses, between which they passed, were in ruins; the sashless windows were stuffed with straw; the unhingeddoors exposed the dark and dirty stairs, which led to dens, still more dun and foul. Here, if "lonely misery retired to die," living wretchedness could scarcely nd a shelter. Yet many an haggard face, many an attenuated form, marked by the squalor of indigence, and the harshness of vice, even here evinced a crowded and superabundant population. The guide, who, as he proceeded through this disgusting suburb, saluted several among those whose idle curiosity had drawn them from their sties, betrayed a courtesy of manner curiously contrasted with his own appearance, and that of the persons he addressed. Every body was "Sir," or "Madam;" and the children were either "Miss," or "Master," or were saluted with epithets of endearment and familiarity.

"Morrow, Dennis, dear, how is it with you?" "Morrow, kindly, Mrs. Flanagan: I hope I see you well, ma'am." "Oh, you're up with the day, Mr. Geratty. How's the woman that owns you?" "Here's a fine morning, Miss Costello, God bless it: is your mother bravely, miss?" "Eh! then Paddy, you little garlagh, why is't not it after the cockles ye are the day, and the tide on the turn."

While, however, he seemed occupied with "an unwearied spirit of doing curtesies," he occasionally threw his shrewd, but sunken eye, over the persons he was conducting; and faithfully translating the expression of the Commodore's looks, he observed:

"Och! it's a poor place, Sir, sure enough; and no poorer room-keepers, your honor, than the Ringsend's, God help 'em, not even in the vaults, Sir."

"The vaults?"

"Och! yes, indeed, the vaults under the fine new streets, Sir, that is'nt built, where there's nothing to pay; only in respect of being mighty moist. Wait a taste, your honor, till yez get an, Sir, and yez will see them swarm out in great style, the craturs!

"And sure it is a most beautiful and sweet country," read aloud Mr. De Vere, who had now found out the passage he had hitherto vainly sought in Spencer, and was treading a clear pathway as they left the miserable outlets of Ringsend and Irishtown behind them. "A most beautiful and sweet country as any under heaven, being stored throughout with many goodly rivers, with all sorts of fish, most abundantly sprinkled with many very sweet islands, and goodly lakes, like little inland seas, that will carry even shippes upon their waters, adorned with goodly woods, even fit for building houses and shippes, so commodiously, as that if some princes in the world had them, they would soon hope to be lords of all the seas, and ere long, of all the world—also full of very good ports and havens, opening into England, as inviting us to come into them, to see what excellent commodities that country can afford. Besides, the soyle itself, most fertile, fit to yield all kind of fruit that shall be committed there unto; and lastly, the heavens most mild, though somewhat more moist than the parts towards the west."

"So much for the Natural State of Ireland," said the Commodore, as the peripatetic student closed his book, to which the guide had given a very humorous attention. "So much for the natural state. Behold the first groupings of its social, its political condition." As he spoke, they entered one of those long-laid-out streets, whose houses, in the course of many years, have not advanced beyond the foundations. From the vaults, the thick smoke of burning straw or rubbish was emitted through holes, perforated in the pavement; while hordes of wretched and filthy creatures crept from beneath the dark roofs of their earthy dwellings, to solicit the charity of those who passed above them. One from among the number, who had been less alert in picking up some scattered small change, flung among them by the gentlemen, continued to run beside them, begging for an "halfpenny to buy bread." It was a little shivering, half-naked girl, pretty, but filthy and emaciated. As the guide came up, she retreated, and a significant glance passed between them, which drove her at once back to her den; but not before she had picked up a silver sixpence flung after her.

"God bless your honor," said the guide, in a tremulous voice: "that's a greater charity than you think, Sir."

"This is all very bad," said Mr. De Vere, "disgustingly bad. Short of actual offensive disgust, affecting the health and organs, I have, myself, no positive objection to suburban wretchedness. There is sometimes a sort of poetical misery in such scenes, very affective to contemplate; not altogether so coarse and squalid as Crabbe's Borough Scenery, but a species of picturesque wretchedness, that has its merit—rags well draped, misery well chiselled, affording a study for the painter's pencil, or a model to the poet's eye."

"But who," asked the Commodore with emphasis, "can see such wretchedness as this, with a man's eye, and not feel it with a man's heart. The mind starts beyond the mere impulse of sympathy here; it rushes at once from the effect to the cause. Indignation usurps the seat of pity, and the spirit rests upon those who have afflicted, not on those who suffer."

"Yes, but even so, you go but half-way. All is evil in political institutes; because all is bad in moral, as all is disgusting in physical nature. All realities are evil, and the whole system, as we know it, but a fortuitous combination of corrupting particles: the brightest specks, the most lucent points, but the shining glitter of putrescence, and even "The brave o'erhanging firmament,

The majestic roof, fretted with golden fires,

"This is Merrion Square, plaze your honor," interrupted the guide, coming forward, "where the quality lives. And there's * Sir John's fountain, your honor. So beautiful! and cost a power! and wouldn't get lave to build a taste

* Sir J., afterwards Lord de B——. It is curious to observe, that the lowest classes of the population of Dublin are perfectly acquainted with the *jobbing systems, under which all public transactions are effected in that metropolis: they also discuss them with a mixture of humour and anger that is extremely characteristic. of them, only he declared to God, and upon his honour, he never would allow a thimblefull of water to come out of them, in respect of a sup never going in. And there they are to this day, a great job, by Jagers; why wouldn't they?

The gentlemen, in their way to their hotel, in Sackville Street, now passed through that line of the Irish metropolis, which brings within the compass of a coup d'œil some of the noblest public edifices and spacious streets to be found in the most leading cities of Europe. All, however, was still, silent, and void. The guide, walking parallel to the travellers, with his eye furtively glancing on them, evidently watched the effect which the beauty of his native city (a beauty of which he was singularly proud) made upon their minds: and when they had reached that imposing area, which includes so much of the architectural elegance and social bustle of Dublin, the area flanked by its silent senate-house, and commanded by its venerable university, he paused, as if from weariness, leaned his burthen against the college ballustrade, and drew upon the attention of the strangers (who also voluntarily halted to look around them), by observing, as he pointed to the right, "That's the ould parliament-house, Sir. Why, then, there was grate work going on there oncet, quiet and aisy as it stands now, the cratur! grate work shure enough! and there's the very lamp-post I climbed up the night of the Union. Och! then you'd think the murther of the world was in it; and so it was, shure enough, —that's of Ireland, your honor; God help her. And there we were, from light to light, and long after, watching, aye, and praying too, and grate pelting, shurely, when they came out, the thieves that sould us fairly. And troth, if we'd have known as much as we know now, it isn't that a-way they'd have got off. And never throve from that hour, nor cared to cry “the Freeman’s”, * and the parliament debates not in it, nor counsellor Grattan. Och, the trade was ruined entirely; and from that day to this, never hawked the bit of paper, nor could raise a tin-penny, only just on arrands, long life to your honors; and that's what the Union has brought us to; and sorrow paper they need print at all, at all, now, only in respect of the paving board, and Counsellor Gallagher's iligant speeches.”

“And what use is made of that magnificent building?” asked Mr. De Vere, who stood gazing upon it with evident admiration.

“What use is it they make of it? your honor; Why then, sorrow a use in life, only a bank, Sir; the bank of

* One of the most spirited, popular, and best conducted papers in the empire.
Ireland; what less use could they make of it? And for all that,” added the guide, significantly, “it cost a power to make it what it is.”

“It is a beautiful thing of its kind,” said De Vere, still gazing upon it, and rather apostrophizing the building than addressing his companion, who stood silent, and self-wrapped—“Beautiful, even now, entire and perfect in all its parts, what will it be centuries hence, touched by the consecrating hand of time, when its columns shall lie prostrate, its pediments and architraves broken and moss-grown, when all around it is silence and desolation? Then haply some strife of elements may conduct the enterprising spirit of remote philosophy to these coasts; may cast some future Volney of the Ohiho or Susquehanah upon the shores of this little Palmyra, and he may surmise and wonder, may dream his theories, and calculate his probabilities; and, bending over these ruins, see the future in the past, and apostrophize the inevitable fate of existing empires."

"Or some American freeman," observed the Commodore, "the descendant of some Irish exile, may voluntarily seek the bright green shores of his fathers, and, in this mouldering structure, behold the monument of their former degradation."

"Why, then, long life to your honors," added the guide, who, with the subtlety incidental to his class and country, drew ingenious, and sometimes exact conclusions, from very scanty premises, and who believed that the strangers were predicting the ruin of Ireland from the event of the Union (an event execrated by all the lower orders of the country). "Why, then, long life to your honors, its true for you, and was said long ago, that after the Union the grass would grow high in Dublin streets; and would this day, plaze God, only in respect of the paving-board, that be's ripping up the streets, and laying down the streets, from June to January, just for the job, by Jagurs.

"Well, there is ould Trinity," he continued, turning towards the college, as he again raised his load upon his shoulders: "the boys that used to bate the world before them on set with their fun and their larning, are now down, like the rest,—and does not know one of them myself now, barring Collagian Barrett."

"By the bye," said Mr. De Vere, "is not this Irish College Smart's 'Temple of Dulness,' in the eyes of whose learned doctors, Swift and Goldsmith could find no favour? I have little respect myself for incorporated learning, or for literature and taste acquired by act of parliament."

"Intellectual illumination," replied the Commodore, "like other things, would, perhaps, best find its maximum when independent of legislative interference."
There is an education belonging to the spirit of the age, and carried on by its influence, far beyond the rules of these worn-out monastic institutions."

"Och! its an ould place, shure enough," said the guide, "and least said about it is soonest mended. Now, plaze your honors, I'm finely rested, many thanks to yez, and so is mounseer too, and will attind you, and lave ould Nosey there to put an; for they've began to deck the lad, early as it is."

As he spoke, he directed the observation of the gentlemen to the equestrian statue of King William the Third, which two men were now busily engaged in decorating with orange and blue ribbons.*

*This ludicrous and offensive spectacle is exhibited at the expense of the civil magistrate, on the anniversary of events connected with the triumph of the revolution party, and the downfall of the Jacobites. To the Catholics, who behold in this outward sign a token of their
"What does it mean," demanded Mr.—

"What does it mane? why it manes to vex the papists sore, your honor, shure that's the ascendency, Sir; only for it, and the likes of it, wouldn't we be this day hand and glove, orange and green: sorrow one colour you'd know from the other. Och! but that would not do—where would the ascendency be?—only all Irishmen then."

The gentlemen at length reached their hotel, which might have been taken for, what it had once been, the splendid mansion of a resident nobleman, polical annihilation, and an insulting arrogation of the supremacy of the minority over the majority, it is a source of heart-burnings, and an incentive to discord. As, however, its continued exhibition is a proof of narrow intellect and bad feeling in the individuals who persist in repeating it, the oppressed party would do well to turn the laugh against their enemies, by ridiculing the taste, and mocking the vanity which finds pleasure in thus disfiguring the statue.

but for the shew-board, which designated its present public use and object.

The capital of Ireland, since the Union, has become a mere stage of passage to such of its great landholders as occasionally visit the kingdom for purposes of necessity. They consider this beautiful city only as a pendant to Holyhead; and take up their temporary lodging to await the caprice of wind and tide, in those mansions where a few years ago they spent a large part of their great revenues, drawn from their native soil. The bill that defrays the expense of a dinner at an inn, thus acquits their debt to the country from which they derive their all, which they dislike to visit, and are impatient to quit.*

"It is very extraordinary that in this large and populous city (Dublin), there should be such an almost total want of good inns for the accommodation of travellers and strangers."—*A Letter from Ireland, by J. Bush, 1764.

Thirty years ago there was but one hotel in Several idle persons stood lounging about the door of the hotel. The only person whom they wished to see, the master, did not appear; and they had to wait some time before the head waiter could be found to tell them whether they could be accommodated: for what is called the dead time of the year, is usually that in which Ireland is most visited by curious strangers (who choose that period as the best for visiting Killarney and the Giant’s Causeway), and by necessitous absentees, who, driven to look for their rents, or to canvass their county, take that time for their penance, which they cannot well employ elsewhere, and make a snatch at Ireland in Dublin; nor was there occasion for more: The nobility and gentry came from their seats at once to their mansions in the capital. When, however, the seat of honourable ambition, and the means of raising a fortune and name were removed to another kingdom, it is natural that the rank and talent of the country should emigrate:
the interval between the London and watering-place seasons.

While the gentlemen walked up and down the hall, with every symptom of impatience, the guide applied to the exhausted Frenchman for payment, who was now lying full length on a bench, uttering many exclamations of annoyance and fatigue. When he understood the meaning of the Irishman's extended hand, he gave him what he considered a sufficient reward for his services. But as this sum was barely what the Irishman expected, he returned it carelessly, with "Here, monsieur! I'll make you a present of it."

"Mais, comment donc, mon ami qu'est ce que c'est."

"What is it, I say, is it? Why then its what I say, I wouldn't dirty my fingers with it."

"Then," said one of the waiters, impatient to get him out of the hall, and snatching the portmanteau out of his hand, "I say, that if you wont take that, I'd give you nothing."

"Wouldn't you, Mr. Connolly?" he replied coolly. "Why then, faith, its often you gave us that, Mister Connolly, and will again, plaze God."

The laugh which this observation excited in the bye-standers, raised Mr. Connolly's choler, and he now endeavoured to hustle the guide out of the hall; but he stood his ground firmly, exclaiming with great coolness, "I wont go till I'm ped, Mr. Connolly; not a foot, Sir, nor wouldn't quit if your master was in it himself."

The Commodore now came forward to learn the cause of the scuffle, and having heard both parties, he turned abruptly to the guide, and demanded, "What employment are you fit for?"

"What employment am I fit for? Every employment in life, Sir, good or bad."
"Would you like to go into service?"

"Is it into reglar service, your honor? Och, then, I never favoured that much."

"Will you go on board ship?"

"Is it on board ship, Sir?" (rubbing round his shoulders and smiling,) "Och, plaze your honor, I oncet went a long voyage, Sir, and the say sickness didn't agree with me."

"Well," said the Commodore, impatiently, "if there was one inclined to be of service to you, to enable you to get some more certain mode of subsistence than that you pursue, what line of life would you prefer?"

"Why, then, long life to your honor, I pray God, and if there was a gentleman would have the great kindness to lind me a trifle to get my rags out of pledge, that I might go back to the trade nate and decent, as my ould father did afore me, I would chose, 'bove all the employments in life, Sir, to stand at the Post-Office and cry the Freeman's Journal, place your honor."

"And what sum will do this for him?" asked the Commodore of the head waiter, who now appeared.

"God bless you, Sir, a pound note would make his fortune; and I would be his banker, and see it laid out to advantage."

The Commodore silently presented the pound note, and was moving away, when the guide following him a few steps, dropt on his knees, and seizing the skirts of his pelisse, remained for a moment struggling for utterance, while the tears stood in his hollow eyes.

"Should I return to Dublin," observed the Commodore, touched perhaps by the silent emotion of feelings so prompt and ardent, so opposed to the poor man's former gay and jocose acuteness, "should I return, I will enquire for you here, and if I find you have given up breaking your fast with whiskey—

"My fast, your honour, that's all for the whole day, Sir, mate of drink, and the rest goes——Plaze your honor, the little bit of a naked girl, at the vault, that's my child, Sir, and four of them—only dacency, your honour, and a bit of pride, and the children, and the pound note, Sir; oh! its too much goodness entirely."

The Commodore drew back from his grasp, and motioning him to rise, added,
"In that case—four children you say."
He then gave another note, and walked rapidly away.

"God bless you, Sir," said the waiter, who ran before, and conducted the gentlemen up stairs. "You have made one poor man happy this morning, at all events."

"You have had a Scena," observed
Mr. De Vere, languidly.

"Almost," he replied, with a deep sigh. "Absentee! yes, well may they be absentees that can. What is that degree of enjoyment and individual happiness, which a man may procure, who is liable every day to behold such misery as we have witnessed, within the last short hour; or who is led to reflect for a moment on the train of misrule, of the collision of interests, prejudices, and feelings, which have produced such a state of society in this fine country?"

This speech was pronounced after they had entered a handsome drawing-room, and while each took possession of a loungers. The waiter then began a long string of apologies. "Dressing-rooms would be got ready in a few minutes, as soon as the Marquis of Inchigeela and his son, Lord Dunmanaway, were gone; and his lordship's travelling carriage was at that moment at the door: but the house was so full; a number of persons from England arrived by the last packet; others about to depart for Holyhead;” and he added, in an aside whisper, “the elderly gentlewoman would be off in a jiffy, as her pochay was ordered, and she had only stepped into the best drawing-room to write a letter.” He then added aloud, that he would just run down himself and introduce the French valet to the French cook, store the gentlemens' things in the dressing-room, and order breakfast.

The waiter then shuffled off, impressed with an high opinion of the consequence of the strangers, from the petulance of the one and the haughty look of the other; and believing them to be well worth attending to, from the extraordinary liberality of the Commodore, who, by an act well adapted to Irish feelings, had bought golden opinions from all who had witnessed it.

The mention made by the waiter of the “elderly gentlewoman,” was the first intimation the strangers received of such a person being present. They now threw their eyes round the spacious room; and a figure, which answered to the description, appeared seated in one of its remote corners at a writing table. They turned their eyes instantly away, for a very fine map of Ireland hung on the wall, near to which they sat. The Commodore took it down, and began to trace his route with a pencil, while Mr. De Vere followed his track with his eye as he looked over his shoulder.

Meantime the gentlewoman resembled, as she sat, one of those wax-work figures, which, at once grotesque and natural, are coloured to the life, yet inanimate as death; for she remained, for a considerable time after the strangers had entered the room, with her eyes rivetted on their persons, and her pen suspended above the paper upon which she had been writing. There was an intensity in her fixed look that implied something more than mere idle curiosity.
In whatever manner their sudden appearance had affected her, they seemed to hold her senses in suspension; and many minutes had elapsed, and the strangers had travelled, on paper, over the whole province of Munster, before she resumed, with a long drawn sigh, the occupation they had interrupted. In her person this elderly gentlewoman was low and somewhat bulky: her head-dress was a tête, with side curls, powdered, surmounted by a small high crowned beaver hat, laid flat upon the head. She wore a black crape veil, so fastened up in the centre as to expose a very red nose, and a very large pair of dark green spectacles; her chin was sunk in her cravat, whose long fringed ends belonged to other epochs of fashion than the present. The immense chitterling of her habit shirt appeared through her single-breasted, long-waisted, brass-buttoned camblet-joseph. Her whole appearance, though most risibly singular, was such as would have been scarcely deemed extraordinary in the remote counties of Ireland twenty or thirty years back, when old fashions and old habits remained in full force among the provincial gentry, who preserved the faith, principles, and costume of their ancestors alike unchanged. Even still such figures are occasionally seen in the middle ranks of rural life, riding on a pillion to mass on a holiday, or making one of a congregation of ten in some remote and solitary church, whose parish, though it bring a large revenue to its non-resident incumbent, may not consist of as many protestant families.

The impatience of the travellers for the refreshment of the toilette and the breakfast table was now considerably abaited by the occupation which the map afforded them. The Commodore had traced with his pencil the great Munster road as far as Cashel; then diverged, by cross ways, towards the Gaulty Mountains, to the towns of Doneraile and Buttevant. From this point he was proceeding towards Kerry, when his companion interrupted him, by observing:

"I perceive we are proceeding by the same route, as far as Buttevant. I am going to the south, and shall halt at Kilcoleman, the reposoir, where, in the course of my pilgrimage through this island of saints, my imagination will do homage to the memory of Spencer. If you have not any objection, I should like much to accompany you so far; but you will reject the proposal with the same frankness it is made, if it is the least géne to you."

"On the contrary, I shall accept it with pleasure, as far as Buttevant; but from thence my uncertain route, through a wild country, will be passed on horseback; and the business of an ardent research would leave me no time for the enjoyment of your society, from which I have already derived so much. But," he added, after an abrupt pause, and suddenly speaking in Spanish, "you are ignorant of my name and situation. You may dislike this equivocal position, in which I am necessarily thrown; for it would not suit my views or my convenience to reveal either. To the title, however, of Commodore, given me by my crew, I have a right: for the rest, you must take me as I am, and upon trust."

"I take you upon your own terms," was the reply, "and I adopt them as my own: to confess the truth, I like the mystery and romance of our connexion. It is foreign to the established forms of the world's calculated ties: and whether or not, when we part, we ever meet again, I shall look upon the accident which brought me acquainted with the commander of II Labrador as among the most pleasant events of my life. I am weary of the stale forms of what is falsely called civilized society; and he who picks me up unknown, unnamed, in the middle of the ocean, receives me between sky and sea, a wanderer in the elements, gives me the rites of hospitality, communicates with me frankly, cherishes no suspicion, seeks no confidence, nor obtrudes any, connects himself, in my imagination, with a state of things, often dreamed of, but rarely realized. Ties, formed under such circumstances, are precious as they are rare; and by me, at least, are valued accordingly."

"And I," said the Commodore, with his splendid smile, brightening the severity of his singular countenance, "have just romance enough to enter into your feelings; for I once made a friendship, in swimming down the Oronoko, which influenced the fortune and bent of my future life."

They then agreed to leave Dublin in two hours; and Mr. De Vere asked "What do you do with your servant?"
"I have none but my Spanish mate, whom I leave to take the command of my vessel, when she is ready for sea."
"Then I also will leave my ridiculous Frenchman behind me, till I arrive at my place of destination; a period 'still hanging in the stars.' The master of this hotel will take care of him, I suppose, if well paid; as he would of my grey parrot, green monkey, or any other exotic animal I might consign to him. I have not the least idea, though, how I shall do without a servant; but the situation will be new, and so far good."

Here the waiter entered, and enquired of the elderly gentlewoman, as if merely to make an excuse to get her out of the room, "Have you any luggage, ma'am, to put up?"—To this question she replied angrily, and interrupting her reassumed letter, which, by the motion of her hand, appeared to consist of characters complex as the ancient Ogham, "Have I any luggage!"
have I? Then do you take me for a snail, why! with all my goods on my back?" The rich round Munster brogue in which this question was asked, the guttural accentation of the 'you' and the 'why' peculiar to that province, and the sharp key in which it was uttered, made the gentlemen start; while the impertinent waiter took no pains to conceal his ready laughter.

"You are mighty pert, Sir," said the old lady, tossing a black wafer about her mouth, and sealing and soiling her ill-folded letter with it: she then gathered up her papers (some printed tracts which lay on the table), and corking her inkhorn, which she dropped into her capacious pocket, as a pebble falls into the bottom of a deep well, she lowered her veil, resumed a black silk rabbit-skin-lined cardinal cloak, and waddling to the door, turned full round, and made a formal courtesy to the gentlemen: the gentlemen bowed, and she retired.
The French valet had now prepared the apparatus for the toilette: but before they adjourned to their dressing rooms, the waiter returned, and presented a note, illegibly written upon a dirty card, which Mr. De Vere took between his finger and thumb, and read, first eagerly to himself, and then aloud, with a look of disgust, amounting almost to nausea: it ran as follows:

"Mistress Magillicuddy presents her respects, on her way to Munster, would make a third in a chay, as far as Tipperary town, if agreeable. N.B. No luggage to signify, foreby a portmantle and bandbox, also a magpie and cage, would hang outside, if not agreeable within: would prefer the gentlemen if serious: begs your acceptance of a religious tract, and am, gentlemen, Yours, &c.

Molly Magillicuddy."

The waiter chuckled, and observed: "The lady says she forgot to mention the bird and bandbox are to be taken up in Thomas Street." Mr. De Vere tossed the note on the table, and went to his dressing room; and the Commodore, with more good breeding, or rather with more good nature, desired the waiter to say that previous arrangements obliged them to decline the honour intended them by Mrs. Magillieuddy.

This singular looking lady had come by the Holyhead packet the night before, and had ordered a chaise previous to the arrival of the gentlemen.—The freedom, with which they had discussed their route before her, had probably suggested the idea of economising her travelling expenses by joining them. She might also have had some more important views, than those which were prudently directed to their purses; for her enquiry as to their being "serious" (a technical term in a particular new light,) indicated her calling; and it was possible she believed herself the elected agent of salvation to them, as to many others, the Krudner or Johanna Southcote of some Munster village, to which she might now be returning, laden with sectarian tracts, and Irish snuff, bohea tea, and intolerance.

When the waiter delivered a negative answer to her card, she shook her head, and said: "In their blindness they know not what they reject why! but the sickle will go forth, and the harvest will yet be reaped."

She shortly after set off for Naas, accusing the waiters of sauciness and extravagant charges, talking Irish with the driver, and lecturing the beggars on the sin of idleness. She accompanied her admonition with some small change; at the same time accounting selfishly for her donation, by observing, "He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord. "O! I engage," said the waiter as she drove off, "it's little you'd give, if you didn't expect it back with interest tenfold—and that's now what the likes of her calls charity! Its the charity that begins at home, aye, and ends there too. Commend me to the gentleman above stairs that gave his two pound notes, and never canted nor preached about it. That's the real charity, long life to him!"

To this ejaculation an "amen" was repeated by all present, who had witnessed the liberality of the Commodore, and heard the departing apostrophe of the "elderly gentlewoman."

Oh! quel homme superieur! quel grand genie, que ce Poco-curante! Rien ne peut lui plaire.

Voltaire.

The two distinguished strangers, whom chance had so singularly united, and who had mutually chosen, from caprice or prudence, to hang the veil of mystery over their respective situations, appeared to touch on the extremes of human character. But there was, notwithstanding, an obvious dove-tailing in their dissimilitudes; and their moral disagreements, like some musical discords, produced a combination more gracious than the utmost perfection of a complete and blended harmony could effect. The one seemed a brilliant illustration of physical and intellectual energy, thrown into perpetual activity; the other a personification of moral abstraction, originating ingenious reveries, which, though sometimes founded in fact, were generally inapplicable in practice. The fortunes of life seemed to have formed the one, and to have spoiled the other. The one thought, sympathized, and acted; the other mused, dreamed, and was passive. Their first half-hour's communication, however, on board ship, was a prompt commutation of mutual good will.—Each felt he was associated with a gentleman; and in that confidence had suffered intimacy to grow with a rapidity disproportionate to its duration. But though opinions were freely discussed, and almost always opposed; though sentiments were broadly debated, and principles vehemently canvassed; yet in the many and long conversations, held during the silence of calm seas and of slumbering elements, by the midnight moon, or the day's prelusive dawn, no circumstance of personal communication had ever passed between them: mutually in possession of each other's leading opinions, and features of character, they were ignorant of all else beside.

Both gentlemen spoke Spanish and French fluently; but the Commodore had a foreign pronunciation of some particular English words, which denoted him to have been long absent from the countries where English is the vernacular tongue. The reading of the younger stranger seemed stupendous. It included the classics, ancient and modern, with the whole belles lettres of European and oriental literature. The studies of the Commodore were evidently more confined to the exact sciences; and, with the exception of Shakespeare, Milton, and Ossian, and of some old quaint English prose writers, the chroniclers of Ireland's hapless story, the Campions, Spencers, and Hanmers, his course of English reading seemed circumscribed. The conversation of the one, therefore, was more elegant, ornamented, and detailed; that of the other more original, energetic, and concise. The one spoke in epic, the other in epigram. They had both travelled much, and far; the one, it should seem, from choice; the other from necessity: and the result from their conversation appeared to be that the one had stored his mind with images, the other strengthened his judgment by observations. The one had studied forms, the other men. The one had only increased his constitutional tendency to satiety and ennui, by the resources which, young as he was, he had already exhausted; the other had sharpened his appetite for enquiry by the experience he had obtained. Such as they were, they were both evidently “out of the common roll of men”—and alike distinguished by personal and mental superiority.
The Commodore had dressed, breakfasted, made the necessary arrangements for their journey to Munster, and gone abroad, before his fellow traveller had gotten half way through his toilette, even with the assistance of Monsieur, his valet. Mr. De Vere had indeed but just sat down to his coffee, and his "Fairy Queen," when the elder stranger returned, after an absence of near two hours.

"Have you seen much of Dublin?" asked the younger traveller, laying down his book.

"Yes, I believe I have been half through it."

"What impression does it give you upon the whole?"

"Why, with its extremes of poverty and splendor, the wretchedness of a great part of its inhabitants, and the magnificence of its buildings, it is to me a Grecian temple turned into a lazaretto. One-third of its population are in an actual state of pauperism: one-half of its trading streets exhibit as many bankrupt sales as open shops: the best houses are to be let, and the debtors' prisons are overflowing."

"Have you, then, had time to visit the prisons?"

"Business brought me to one: business with the high sheriff of a county, who has delivered himself up for the purpose of a whitewashing under the insolvency act, as he termed it."

"Ha! ha! ha! an high sheriff in prison—that's singular enough!"

"Not so singular in Ireland; for two other high sheriffs were confined in the same room with him, and for the same purposes."

"The laws must be well administered! But, doubtless, they are all honorable men."

"They are loyal men, as my friend the sheriff told me, though under a little present difficulty."
"You have purchased a pocket telescope, I perceive."

"Yes, and a little information from the intelligent optician from whom I bought it. I went into his shop as the tax-gatherer was carrying out of it several articles which he had seized for non-payment. The owner was looking on calmly, and to some observation of mine, he replied, 'I have not the money, Sir: there's no use in talking: when government have got all, we shall be at rest: we cannot be worse.' To my remark on the supposed tendency of the Union, so often vaunted in newspapers, and in debate, that it would bring English capital into Irish trade; he answered, 'The effect of the Union is ruin to Ireland: since that epoch her debt has increased, her resources diminished, her taxes augmented, her manufactures languishing, her gentry self-exiled, her peasantry turbulent from distress, and her tradesmen, like myself, drained to the last farthing, and sighing to remove to that country, where they will not be obliged to pay a large rent to the government, for leave to live; to America.* But all cannot do this.—I note these observations as being curious from one of his class.

"It is a pity," said the younger stranger, "that these Americans are so baroque, for they are, politically speaking, a great people; they are, however, so prosperous, that they can never be interesting: they are beyond the reach of prose or verse: we may say of their national, as of Darby and Joan's conjugal felicity,

They eat, and drink, and sleep,—what then? Why sleep, and drink, and eat again."

The waiter now entered, presented the bill, and announced that all was ready for their departure. The landlord, who in his communication with Mr. De Vere, on the subject of his valet, had decided at once that he was a man of rank and fashion, now attended, and did the honours of his house in the usual style of Irish hyperbole.

"Upon my credit, gentlemen, I'm heartily sorry we're losing the honour of your company so soon; and think I could make the place plazing to you, if you would do me the honour, on your return from the Lakes (for supposes it is to them you're going), and am sorry you make such a short stay, without seeing the Rotunda, and the College, and the Dublin-Society house, and the statues."

"Statues! what statues," demanded the younger stranger, catching at the sound, and stopping short.

"The statues, Sir, at our society house, that's kept in the greatest style, and gets a touch up, whenever the place is painted. That's by order, as we say, in the society house."—"By what order?" was demanded, with a smile.—"By order of the committee of fine arts; and myself was one, until business came on me so thick, and took up my attention; and has a brother that shews at the exhibition every year, a great artist. Indeed, I think you’d be plazed, gentlemen, if you were to stop and see the exhibition this saison, and portrait No. 2, full length of Mr. Roger O’Rafferty, of the Back-lane division auxiliary yeomanry corps, in full regimentals, standing quite quiet, and a cannon going off in the Phanix;* that’s by my brother, Sir." This detailed statement of the cognoscente landlord to prove the flourishing state of the arts in Ireland, the country which has given to the English school of painting a Barry, a Shee, and a Tresham, seemed quite sufficient to satisfy the curiosity of the strangers, who passed on, through files of beggars, to their carriage: they threw some silver among them, and hastily drew up the windows, to exclude the infected air, as they drove away.

"Pa!" said the finer gentleman of the two, "this is breathing pestilence."

"And witnessing its causes in all their most shocking details: look, what a splendid scene for such a grouping! what a noble street, and what a mendicant population!"

As they passed through the southern suburb, the Commodore demanded of the postillion the name and purposes of an immense building, on the opposite side the water.

"Is it that forenent us, plaze your honor, across the Liffy? Oh! that's the Royal Barracks; and them there's the Richmond Barracks; and if your honour could see behind you, Sir, you'd see the Porto Bello barracks, and there afore you is Island bridge barracks, and the barracks in the town; and Musha, myself does not know the half o'them. You might travel in the county Dublin mountains, rising there on your lift, from barrack to barrack, and never get sight of inn, or house, man or baste, only sogers, Sir."

"From this sample," said the Commodore, addressing his companion, "we might suppose the whole country to be one great fortress; as it was in Elizabeth's day, when the population was divided into the English rebel and the Irish enemy. What an expense this army of occupation must prove to an impoverished country!"

"I have, myself," returned Mr. De Vere, "no objection to a military government: 'tis at least a picturesque legislation: it affords something to look at, and to describe. I like military architecture, battlements and ramparts, watch-towers and bastions. The military costume, too! the helm and hau-berk, and warlike sounds "Of trumpets loud, and clarions.

"England is hastening fast to this,
but she will always want appropriate scenery."

"And I trust an appropriate spirit too! Look at Turkey."

"Why, yes, there is something to look at. But next to a military, I should prefer an ecclesiastical government, the despotism of some dark bigotry, some religion

"Full of pomp and gold,
With devils to adore for deities;
Familiars and inquisitors for ministers of state, and auto-da-fes for national festivals."

"Spain, for example; for though your fertile imagination invent, as it may, sources of oppression and degradation to man, there are still governments in Europe to leave mere fable far behind."

"Well, after all, call governments by what name you will, they all equally leave man as they find him, feeble and selfish."
“Yes, because he is man. But in following the natural order of things, you at least make him all he is capable of being. Nature is the great legislator. In creating man free, she commanded him to remain so; and re-action, sooner or later, follows the violation of this her first great edict.”

“This is Naas, your honour,” observed the postillion, addressing himself to the Commodore, at the end of more than an hour’s silence, interrupted only by occasional questions, addressed to the driver, relative to the surrounding objects—“and there is more barracks, Sir;” and he pointed to a handsome square building, in itself almost a town: “and there’s the jail, Sir, an iligant fine building, and a croppy’s head spiked on the top of it. I’ll engage,” he added, opening the door (for Naas was their first stage);—“I’ll engage he’ll rue the day he saw Vinegar-hill, any how, wherever he is, poor lad.”
The Commodore, as he alighted, raised his eyes to the point at which the postillion's whip was directed, and beheld a human head, bleached and shining in the noon-day sun-beam. Such are the objects still exhibited in Ireland, as monuments of times of terror, to feed the vindictive spirit of an irritated people; announcing triumph to one party, and subjection to another. The Commodore turned away his eyes in disgust, and passed under the fine arch of a ruined monastery of Dominicans; as if it were relief to his feelings to associate with less frightful images of death in its retired cemetery, than to behold them connected with such horrific associations, exposed in the high road of a public thoroughfare, a frightful land-mark for an unfortunate country.

The travellers proceeded on their journey towards the province of Munster, a province peculiarly interesting for its historical recollections, and for those scenes, alternately wild and picturesque, which attract to its site the footsteps of taste and curiosity, and furnish to foreign artists so many combinations of scenic loveliness. Conversation had been frequently dropped and renewed; and the travellers had remained silent for some miles, when they overtook a chaise, from which Mrs. Magillieuddy formally saluted them. The elder stranger recognizing the green spectacles and chitterling (the most conspicuous parts of her figure) answered her salutation with a bow; the younger turned away his head in disgust.

"An ounce of civet would not sweeten my imagination," he observed, "from the infection communicated to it by that horrible old Irishwoman. Shut up in this chaise with her and her magpie!!—Do you know, this image has haunted me ever since she made the frightful proposal."

The smile of his companion indicated his consciousness of this avowed prejudice; and the attention of the travellers became again engaged with the passing scene. The various objects which presented themselves to their view, both moral and physical, were seen by each through such mediums as their respective peculiarity of character, taste, and temperament, were likely to produce. The one, rapid in perception, instinctively just in inference, quick, curious, active, inquiring, directed the whole force of his acute, prompt observation, to the people and their localities, as both appeared upon the surface. He turned his eyes to the peasant’s hut: it was the model of the "mere Irishman’s" hovel, as it rose amidst scenes of desolation during the civil wars of Elizabeth’s reign. It was the same described by William Lithgow, the Scotch pilgrim, the noted traveller of that remote day. "A fabrick erected in a single frame of smoke-torn straw, green, long-pricked turf, and rain-dropping wattles; where, in foul weather, its master can scarcely find a dry part to repose his sky-baptized head upon."

He beheld the tenant of this miserable dwelling working on the roads, toiling in the ditches, labouring in the fields; with an expression of lifeless activity marking his exertions, the result of their deep-felt inadequacy: his gaunt athletic frame was meagre and fleshless, his colour livid, his features sharpened; his countenance, readily brightening into smiles of gaiety or derision, expressed the habitual influence of strong dark passions. The quick intelligence of his careless glances mingled with the lurking slyness of distrust,—the instinctive self-defence of conscious degradation. He beheld multitudes of half-naked children, the loveliness of their age disfigured by squalid want, and the filthy drapery of extreme poverty, idle and joyless, loitering before the cabin door, or following in the train of a mendicant mother, whose partner in misery had gone to seek employment from the English harvest, where his hire would be paid with the smile of derision; and where he would be expected to excite laughter by his blunders, who might well command tears by his wretchedness.

In the proclaimed districts, the misery of the peasant population was most conspicuous. For he to whom might well set both at defiance. The forfeit of life could be deemed but a small penalty to him, who in preserving it "sheweth a greater necessity he hath to live, than any pleasure he can have in living."

"The world was no friend, nor the world's law;"

The few vehicles, public or private, observable on the high roads, the total absence of a respectable yeomanry, marked the scantiness of a resident gentry, and the want of that independent class, "a country's boast and pride." Yet many stately edifices, the monuments of ancient splendor or modern taste, rose along the way; the former in ruins, the latter almost invariably unfinished. The castle of the ancient chief, and the mansion of the existing landlord, were alike desolated and deserted. Town succeeding town, marked the influence and power of the great English palatines, who drew their wealth and luxury from a land, to which, like their forefathers, for generations back, they were strangers; and the name and arms of the English nobility, suspended over inns, emblazoned over court-houses, and fixed in the walls of churches, or shining above their altars, marked the extensive territories of these descendants of the undertakers, and grantees of the Elizabeths, the James's, and the Charles's. The surface of the country, as it appeared, contained the leading facts of its history, and those who ran might read. He who now read, studied not without a comment the text whose spirit and whose letter were mis-rule and oppression.

The young stranger saw with other eyes; and by the illusory lights of a sleepless imagination. But his philosophy, though cynical, was not the cynicism of experience; it was the satiety of early excited and promptly exhausted sensations. Man, with him, was everywhere as well off as he deserved to be, because nowhere did "man delight" him; while all references came home to his own enjoyment, and were appreciated as they extended or curtailed its sphere. He looked only to that which could gratify the dominant faculty of his existence; and while he found

"Nature wanted stuff,
'To vie strange forms with fancy,'"
he sought in the combinations of art, as formed under various epochs of society, for such objects and images as embodied events long passed, or consecrated, and preserved in memory and imagination only.

He had induced his companion to lengthen and diverge from their route by visiting the town of Kildare, once a city of historical and monkish importance, because there, his road-book told him, were still visible some remains of the 'Firehouse,' the Christian temple, where the nuns of St. Bridget performed the rites of the heathen priestesses of Vesta, and watched over the sacred flame, which the English bishop, Henri de Londres, afterwards sacrilegiously extinguished (2). He found a little town, ruinous and wretched, with many symptoms of poverty, and few of antiquity; and he hurried from it in disappointment and dislike. He insisted on stopping the first night at Kilkenny, for the purpose of viewing the feudal castle of the Butlers, and the splendid ruins of its abbies. But, even here, imagination had got the start of fact; and, though a busy fancy peopled the silent aisles of St. Francis and St. John's with

"eremites and friars, White, black, and grey, with all their trumpery;"

though he garrisoned the ramparts with "Irish kernes and galloglasses," imagination left possibility every where behind. Disappointment hung like a noxious vapour upon his steps; and he every where found reason, or sought it, to scoff at the folly and feebleness of man, who, under all stages of society, is the victim of blindness, beyond his power to dispel; alternately tyrant or slave, impostor or dupe, and neither by his own free will. But though he saw the evil, he neither felt for its effects, explored its cause, nor suggested its remedy; and the talents of this accomplished ideologist, neither calculated nor exerted to benefit mankind, confined their lustre to him, they lighted alike to evil or to good.

Views thus opposed, and sentiments thus contrasted, naturally begot frequent and long protracted discussions, as fresh objects afforded themes for observation or reflection; and the travellers had passed the boundaries of the frequently proclaimed county of Tipperary, without interruption to their debate, or any impediment to their journey (such as have been supposed the inevitable concomitants of Irish posting); when the postillion, alighting to lead his horses over a bad step, startled them, by exclaiming aloud—"Why, then, the curse of the divil on ye, Longford-pass, I pray Jasus, for you've joulted the very life out of me, so you have:" then having desired his horses to "get along out of that," he dropped back, and laying his hand upon the carriage window, entered into conversation with the gentlemen, by strongly advising them to give up the *iday of making Thurles their sleeping stage: first, *ecause it was the same to his employer whether they went a few miles one way or t'other; and, secondly, ecause that Thurles town would be full of th' army, in respect of changing quarters; two regiments marching to Cork and Kerry, to be sprinkled among the towns and mountain-barracks; and there will be grate billeting the night, and the inn taken up entirely with the officers; and what matter? Shure Holy-cross was but a dony bit further, and wouldn't make an hour's differ. There was a new opposition inn in the neighbourhood set up against Thurles, kept by the maister's cousin-germain, Mr.

* Dony, small—so used by Spencer.
Dooly, where every thing was nate and clane, and quiet.

"Is Holy-cross a town?" demanded Mr. De Vere, caught by the religious romance of its name (3).

"It is, your honor; that is, it is not a town, Sir, only a township and chapelry; and blessed ground every foot of it, and well may be. Is'nt there a grate big piece of the holy cross itself, the wood of life, buried in the fine ancient ould abbey there, that the travellers be coming to see far and near? And its that, why, plaze your honors, the saying goes, that of all places in the world round, the devil (Christ save us!) daren't shew the track of his hoof near that township: and troth, gentlemen dear, it would be worth while to go ten mile round any time to see it, only in respect of the lovely fine tomb of th' ould king that's in it, my namesake, Carbrogh O'Brien, King of Limerick. Which road shall I take, Sir? There lies the turn to Thurles, and there to Holy-cross, your honor."

"I think the quiet inn, the ruined abbey, and O'Brien's tomb, decide it," said the Commodore.

"Unquestionably," replied his companion; and the driver received his orders for Holy-cross. As he turned his horses' heads, a chaise passed before them, taking the Thurles road; and the spectacles, tête, and high crowned hat of Mrs. Magillicuddy, appeared above the magpie's cage, which was suspended at the side of one of the windows.

"Raison de plus," said Mr. De Vere, sinking back in the carriage. "I would rather fall in with a legion of marching regiments than come in the way of that horrible old woman, and a renewal of her terrifying proposition."

The Commodore smiled. He was amused to observe, that Mrs. Magillicuddy and her magpie had taken possession of his companion's susceptible imagination; that the idea of an intimate association with her had become as much the chimæra dire of his fancy, as her actual presence would have been the annoyance of his senses, and the destruction of his ease and comfort: he had more than once alluded to the dégout of an atmosphere of Irish snuff and marrow pomatum, to the uninviting images of spectacles and pocket handkerchiefs, pious tracts, and fusty bird-cages. The accident of her going the same rout, and her being enabled to keep pace with them, by their delay at Kildare and Kilkenny (for till the last stage they had travelled with four horses), were conjured into nothing else than a fatality; and even her innocent magpie was considered as an oiseau de mauvais augure.

"You are certain," said the younger traveller, addressing the driver, and pointing to the route taken by the old lady's chaise, "that road leads to Thurles?"

"Shure and sartin, your honor, straight on forenent, and a turn in it to the lift that lades to the nunnery, Sir."

"What nunnery? Are there nunneries in this country?"

"Is it nunneries, Sir? There is plinty: there is one there, off to the lift, between Thurles road and Holy-cross, is the convent of our Lady of the Annunciation: they say, your honor, that in th'ould times there was subterrancies under ground, between the nunnery and th'abbey of Holy-cross; and there was a story went about a grey abbot, and—troth it makes myself laugh, its so funny, only Father Murphy, Sir, says there no truth in it, and so I don't believe it, for the church knows best always, Sir."—He now jumped upon the wooden bar, which served him as a seat, and giving his horses the whip, proceeded at a rapid pace.
As the travellers approached the miserable little village of Holy-cross, the sun's last rays had withdrawn from the horizon in all the mild and melancholy gloom of an autumnal evening. The grey tints of the clouded atmosphere were reflected in shadows on the bosom of the Suir, along whose banks arose the stately ruins of the abbey. The inn, recommended by the driver, the only inn, was a small house leading to the village, and bearing the sign of the Mitre and Crosier, as appropriate to its site.

The approach of a chaise was evidently no common event; for the landlord, his wife, a ragged old waiter, with a bare-footed girl (the bar-maid, house-maid, and kitchen-maid of the establishment), had stood at the door for some time, eagerly watching its approach. All were instantly in employment, carrying in the portmanteaux, conducting the travellers to their room, and knocking their heads together, in a confusion, increased by their efforts to do the honours to such unusual guests. The travellers perceived that they were also the only guests; and they were not displeased by a circumstance which not only ensured their quietude, but their accommodation; for in Ireland, inns are good in proportion as they are unfrequented, that is, as they are not patronized by some great man, whose servant or dependant obtains the tontine or principal hotel of the town, which his former master rules; and adds to this situation some office under government, which renders him above his business as an innkeeper, and induces him to act with insolence when called upon in the capacity he despises. The humble innkeeper of Holy-cross had recently fitted up a couple of bed-rooms in what had lately been a mere Shebeen house, (4) and dignified with the name of inn the little building which had been for half a century a noted baiting-place for foot and horse travellers, and of such pious pilgrims as still came (and they were not few) to visit the shrine of the holy relic.

A few inquiries, and the ordering of a late dinner, took up a quarter of an hour; after which the travellers proceeded to visit the abbey. The twilight was thickening into darkness, but the air was fresh and balmy; and motion and activity were positive enjoyments to those who had for many hours suffered the cramping restraint and fatiguing dislocation of an Irish post-chaise.

The inn lay half a mile from the abbey, to which they passed over a bridge, thrown across the river Suir, and forming a communication between the village and the abbey grounds. The ruins covered a considerable tract, and were contrasted in their imposing magnitude by a few wretched hovels constructed out of their fragments. This consecrated pile is among the few in-interesting monuments of antiquity now extant in that country, which, according to the statements of the biographer of St. Rumoldi, once contained some of the most magnificent religious edifices of Europe.

Raised by the piety and power of an Irish provincial prince, Donagh Carbraigh O'Brien, for monks of the Cistercian order, and consecrated to the holy cross, St. Mary, and St. Benedict, it owed its principal consequence to the relic of the cross incased in gold and precious stones, and given by Pope Paschal II. to Mac Morragh, the predecessor of Carbragh. The charms of the beautiful architecture must, in days so rude, have contributed not a little to its fame; and the devotion paid to the relic it enshrined has been declared by an English minister* to have been universal throughout the island.

* See Sir Henry Sidney’s State Papers.
The strangers contemplated for a considerable time the broken mass of its dark exterior, and the high steeple, supported by beautiful gothic arches. They entered the broad nave, but, like the rest of the ruin, it was wrapt in one undistinguishing hue; and the majesty of darkness succeeded to the deep and misty forms of twilight.

"Darkness," said the younger stranger, after a silence of some minutes, "is decidedly the source of the true sublime."

"And light," replied the Commodore, "of beauty: light is life, the source of forms and motions: darkness is death: I abhor it."

"And I love it. I love the uncertainty of this mysterious dimness (for instance), where every thing is guessed, and nothing known; where at every doubtful step,

"Solemn and slow the shadows blacker fall, And all is awful listening gloom around."
A deep sigh, heard near and distinct, answered as he spoke.

"Did you sigh?" he asked quickly.
"No: did not you?" was the reply.
"Not I. Yet some one sighed most assuredly."

"'Tis the wind among the ruins," said the Commodore, carelessly.

"No, the air is breathless. It was a human, perhaps a super-human inspiration."

"That is physically impossible: respiration is organization: spirits have none. But do you believe in super-human agency?"

"I believe, and I deny nothing.—I resign myself passively to events, moral and physical, as they occur. This, I fancy, was the original intention of providence with respect to man; which made him dark, and left him so; the child of ignorance, and its victim."

"Then why endow him with faculties, which impel him to enquiry, and force him into action, which lead him to dispel his darkness, and rise above his nature?"

"Hush! there again! I am certain I heard the heavings of a short convulsive respiration. 'Tis most singular!"

"The place affects you. We will return, and view it by daylight."

"No," said Mr. De Vere, seating himself on a fragment of the ruin: "this is to me positive enjoyment."

As he spoke, the dispersion of a dense cloud, which had long scowled over the darkened landscape, and which now broke into fleecy vapour, displayed the broad bright moon, rising in splendour above the roofless ruin. A sheet of light fell upon the nave, which the strangers occupied, but left in shadow the lateral aisles, which formed a pilastered arcade on either side. Parts of the ruin remained black and massive, while the shrine of the holy relic stood illuminated; and broken rays and silver points glittered on the projected tracery of the arches and twisted pillars, which supported the canopy of the royal tomb.

The imagination of the younger traveller was busied in conjecturing which part of the building had been the choir, which the refectory, which the dormitory, when the Commodore observed: "Fanaticism raised these walls, and fanaticism destroyed them.* Their foundation recalls a degraded epoch of the human mind, when bigotry bribed its way to heaven, and purchased salvation with the fruits of that violence and injustice which risked it. These monkish potentates, these sanctified violators in all ages and regions, are alike contemptible—their holy alliances and system of spoliation—their building of churches and breaking of treaties, combine the vices of fraud and hypocrisy, and rob ambition of its glory, and majesty of its respect."

"Still," said De Vere, "I like a religion of forms, a tangible religion, as I beheld it in Spain, where I was once half tempted to turn monk; a religion mingled with intrigue and credulity, passionate and pious, the ready agent of love and devotion." He sighed profoundly, and asked: "Is not this the twenty-fifth of August?"

"I believe so," was the reply.

"'Tis a curious coincidence: on this day, at this hour, seven years ago, my birth-day too, the day I came of age, being in Galicia in Spain, chance led me to the site of a Moorish ruin adjoining the cloisters of the church of the celebrated convent of Nuestra Senora de las Angustias.* I passed, musing on the course of things, from the fragments of Arabic taste, and Mahometan superstition, into the temple of Christian rites. Vespers were just celebrated. A few stragglers, who had remained after service, gradually disappeared. I was still examining monuments, gazing on pictures, and numbering columns, when darkness fell around me: the different avenues of entrance were closed, all save one, which led to what had once been a Moorish orangerie: this orangerie formed a part of the pleasure-grounds and cemetery of the adjoining convent. While I looked round for some means of egress, and twilight rendered all objects dim and uncertain, sounds, that seemed to come from heaven, met my ear: the next moment my eye fell upon the minstrel. By the white veil and rosary, it was an unprofessed novice: she was seated on the fragment of a Moorish bath, leaning her cheek close to the lute, from which she had drawn such enchanting harmony, as if she were childishly, yet prettily, charmed with the sound herself had made.

"It is a pretty image altogether," said his auditor, seating himself beside him, among the ruins, "and reminds me of a famous picture of Rosso Fiorentino, of a seraph listening to its own lute."

"The resemblance was so great," returned the narrator, "that I had that design copied on this box, with the little alteration of substituting the novice's veil for the wing of the cherub, and the head of a lovely woman for that of a seraph."

As he spoke, he drew from his pocket a superb gold box, surmounted with the picture he had described, done in enamel. The moonlight fell full upon its surface; and in the position in which the Commodore held it, it was distinctly visible. "Is this head a portrait?" he demanded.

"Not exactly. It was done from the idea I gave the artist; an idea in every sense: for though the form and outline of the fair original, her fairy stepping, her aërial motions, became too soon well known, yet the features which that envious veil concealed were never but dimly seen, half shrouded, half revealed, pale in the moon's uncertain light, dark under the shadows of the monumental cypress. In the stolen and dangerous interviews which followed the first accidental meeting, amidst scenes of silence, mystery, and death, that face was never fully revealed. Oh! there was in that sweet, pure, and short lived communion, a fanciful and unearthly charm, which I have often since vainly sought. It was associated with scenes impressive on the imagination: it was pure as a spirit's love: no sordid view or selfish feeling polluted the bright spring of genuine passion. I was loved for myself; nor knew I the name of my concealed mistress, save that which the church had given her—the Sister Benedicta."

"Then you wooed, and won this mysterious saint?" asked the Commodore, impatiently. "Wooed! yes; wooed, and weaned the soul of this consecrated being from her heavenly spouse, 'her spouse in vain;' but my conquest stopped there. I proposed to carry my young novice to South America; and in some of the Eden cliffs of the cloud-embosomed Cordelliras to lead with her that blessed life of free unfettered passion, which nature dictated to the first created pair. Pride, bigotry, which she doubtless dignified with the name of virtue, triumphed over love. We parted: I found her innocent, I left her so; I found her happy too, at least contented and deceived; and it is not long since I ordered a Spanish friend to raise a cenotaph to her memory, in the cemetery of her convent, with this device—A lily fading beneath a sun-beam; and with this motto 'Sic me Phæbus amat.'

"You know then that she died, and think 'twas of a broken heart?" asked his auditor.

"I cannot doubt it; though I have never heard from the friend to whom I trusted my sad commission; and to tell you the truth, the conviction still haunts my imagination, with a melancholy force, that grows with what it feeds on."

"Oh! your imagination!" repeated the Commodore, significantly, as he returned the box.

"Yes," continued the narrator; "and in sketching the story, which I have given to the world anonymously, the description of her death-bed scene almost drove me mad."

A short wild laugh now rang through the ruins, as if some malignant fiend had formed a part of the audience, and scoffed at the fantastic folly of human vanity, the short-lived influence of human passion.

The strangers both started, and remained for a moment silent and motionless.

"We have been overheard," said the elder.

"I should say by nothing human," replied his companion. "Look round you: see, we are alone: all is now silence and solitude."

"Now, perhaps, but not a moment back.—Look there, something is in motion."

They both darted forward. The moon had sunk in clouds, the stars were few, the pavement broken, and their steps uncertain. Still the Commodore attained the object of his pursuit. It was an old mule grazing on the scanty herbage which sprang up among the ruins.

"This is a most ludicrous adventure!’ said the Commodore; ‘and we had better terminate it by returning to our inn and our supper.’

The younger stranger still loitered, still mused: the elder drew his arm through his: they proceeded in silence; and though during their meal they talked of indifferent subjects, it was evident to the quick perception of the latter that the incident of the abbey had deeply affected the imagination of his fanciful companion; he, however, made no allusion to it, and his silence corroborated an inference founded in fact.
CHAPTER III.

Rocks, caves, lakes, fens, bogs, dens,
And shades of death. All monstrous,
All prodigious things! — Milton.

Buttevant, the Bothon of Ecclesiastical books, the Kilnemullagh of Spencer, immortalized by his residence in its neighbourhood, was the last stage which the travellers had agreed to pass together; and whether a feeling of regret attended this conviction, or other causes secretly operated to protract their departure, they left Holy-cross at an hour comparatively late, to begin a journey of some distance through one of the wildest mountain tracts, and least frequented cross roads, in the province of Munster.
Their next stage, however, was excellent: it was only to Cashel; and to judge from the group of sturdy fellows, who lurked about the door of the inn to which the travellers were driven, that town was not without its due portion of idlers—a natural circumstance in the capital of a grazing county. As the chaise stopped, the gentlemen were looking over their travelling map. They had marked out their route by the road-book, and had chosen the most picturesque, rather, perhaps, than the best line of progress; and in crossing the elevated chain of the Galties, they had selected the road by Gaul Bally (the town of the Gauls or Celts), with its monastic ruins, in preference to the glen of Agherlow, a valley on the opposite side of the mountains, which would have lengthened their route, but would have presented a more beaten track, though in itself sufficiently wild and romantic. Whichever way they took, the driver assured them that they would reach Buttevant by sunset, "God willing, and barring accident."

As they descended, therefore, from their carriage, they ordered a chaise and horses for Gaul Bally, to be ready against their return from the rock.*

"Certainly, Sir," said the landlord,† slightly touching his hat, and resuming his conversation with a man-of-business-looking person, who was talking to him at the door. "Barney, a chaise on to Gaul Bally."

Barney, having taken due time to consume a portion of tobacco, called out in his turn to a driver near him, "Tim, honey, just call out a chay to Gaul-Bally."

* The rock of Cashel, the romantic scite of its cathedral.

† As inns, in common with the royal caravanseras of the eastern apologue, are subject to a frequent change of masters, it is probable that some such revolution has occurred at the inn at Cashel since these events took place: at least, the author has no reason to charge its present occupants with incivility.
Tim, who was seated on the steps of a horse-post, playing with a large dog, addressed himself to a blind beggar, with "step into the yard, and tell Corney Doolin a chay's wanting to Gaul Bally."

"What is the distance to Gaul-Bally?" asked the Commodore, who, as well as his fellow traveller, had observed the progress of these deputed orders with impatience and irritation.

"What is the distance to Gaul Bally?" returned the landlord with sangfroid, as if he now first observed them, "upon my word and reputation, Sir, I can't say—that is really,—Gaul Bally. Barney, can you answer these gentlemen?"

"Och, Sir, shure you don't post to Gaul Bally at all at all: there's no posting there, Sir, nor wasn't many a-year. If the gentlemen bes going to Doneraile or Buttevant, they'd best go the low road, and take the glen of Agherlow to Mitchels town."

"We are resolved not to take any road but that we've fixed on; and I suppose we can have a chaise and horses to what stage and place we choose, no matter where, if we pay for them."

This observation, made with haughtiness and petulance by Mr. De Vere, induced the landlord to uncover his head, and to reply: "Certainly, Sir: if you indemnify me, Sir, I can let you have every accommodation in life; up to the top of Mangerton, if you please; only there is no posting, I give you my word, gentlemen, on these cross roads in Munster: that is, I don't send out my cattle by the mile; but you can have them by the job, or day, and welcome."

"Why then, job or day," said Barney, with a significant look at his master, "if the chay goes by Gaul Bally, its on a low backed car it will come back."

"Shure enough," said Tim, rubbing round his shoulders, "and wouldn't care to be the driver, barring I was well ped, and left my throath behind me, specially near Kilbalogue, the thieves' wood, down there, below."

"I came that way in my gig from Kilfinnen," said the man of business, "and found it good enough, and two dragoons with me."

"Och, then, it behoves you, and the likes of you, Mr. Fogarty," said Tim, "to look to that, Sir; for the times never ran so hard against the excise as now: in respect of bringing down the military, and the grate still-hunting, and fining the townlands to ruination."

"Will you take the chay on to Buttevant, gentlemen?" asked the innkeeper.

"To Buttevant, certainly—perhaps further," replied the younger traveller.

"I don't think I could give it under seven or eight guineas a-day," he returned, musing; "but I'll let you know in a minute;" and he entered the house, followed by Tim, Barney, and the exciseman, to hold a council.

"Eight guineas a-day! sorrow send it you, Mr. Collogon!—eight guineas! Dioul!"

This apostrophe was made by a person who leaned against the back of the stranger's chaise. He was wrapped in a huge frize coat, wore a slouched hat over a grey wig, and stood slashing a long cutting whip against the pavement. When, however, he perceived the travellers proceeded towards the rock of Cashel without noticing him, he followed them, touched his hat, and said, "I'll drive your honors to Buttevant, and that to your hearts content, for half the money, and has as diligent a chay, and as nate a pair of mountain cattle, as any in Condon's country; and keeps myself, your honor, hard bye, convenient to Buttevant, near Kilcoleman, Sir, and runs my garans on my own account, and came with a fare to Cashel the day before yesterday, and was waiting for a return, your honor, which would serve me entirely, Sir."

"Do you know the route well through the Galties?"

"Do I, is it, Sir? Och! may-be I don't! and would go it my lone blindfold from Galtimore to Misenhead; and from Knockmell down to the reeks in Killarney; and that's a brave step, Sir."

"I should like to disappoint that nonchalant host of the Star, and his imposing driver," said the elder traveller.

"And this man residing near Kilcoleman," said the younger, "has a classical interest with me. I shall probably engage him while I reside in the neighbourhood of Spencer's fairy ground."

The bargain was instantly made, and the chaise ordered to be at the inn door in half an hour, the time assigned to visit King Cormac's chapel. Meanwhile, the master of the Kilcoleman chaise undertook to inform the host of the Star that his horses would not be wanting; and when the travellers returned from their antiquarian visit, they found all ready for their departure.

While the light luggage was removing into the new vehicle, the appearance of that vehicle, its horses, and driver, were a source of affected entertainment to the disappointed landlord and his satellites.

"Barney, that's a nate article of a chay," observed Tim. "Troth, I would not wonder if it was ould Cormac Mac Coleman's travelling landau, when he went the pilgrimage to Holy cross."

"Faith, Tim, lad, you're not much out, I believe; for there's a crown on it, shure enough, which shews it belonged to th' ould kings of Munster, any how, King Flann or Brien Borru, may be.'

"Why then, for all that, Barney, I wisht I had all the chickens that ever was hatch'd in it, grand as it is. And look at the garans, * Sir; Och! but their grate bastes, and warranted not to draw. I'll engage they'd rather die than run, and no ways skittish, that's certain, any way."

The owner of this equipage, against which so many sarcasms were launched, was hitherto coolly rubbing down his horses with a whisp of straw; and singing, or rather humming,

"I am a rake and a rambling boy,
My lodging 'tis near Aughnaghcloy."

He now paused, however, to observe, "The cattle's shurely not so fine as them was shot in the mail, near Kilworth, Mr. Barney Heffernan, but they are good mountain cattle, for all that,

* Poor back horses.
and will take the gentlemen better through the Galties, and safer too, than handsomer bastes, plase Jasus!"

The former part of this observation had caused a very obvious revulsion in the colour of Mr. Heffernan's face, who, drawing some straws from between the wheels of the chaise, said, in a conciliating voice, "I'm glad to see you about the world again, Owny—when did you set up driver?"

"A little after the tithe-proctor's business in the murdering glen below, in the county of Waterford," replied Owny, significantly.

Barney Heffernan slunk away, and no further sarcasm was launched against Owny's set-out, which both the gentlemen stood for some minutes examining with curiosity; the Commodore wiping with his handkerchief the dust from the pannel on which the coronet, alluded to by one of the drivers, was visible, surmounting a defaced crest and armo-
The chaise was indeed of a very singular and antique build; low, angular, with a projecting roof. The large windows, which once perhaps entitled it to the appellation of a glass coach, were now partly filled up with wooden pannels; and through the rents of the coarse check modern lining, remnants of crimson velvet, and rich, but thread-bare livery lace, spoke its former gentility. The travellers had proceeded some miles from Cashel, in a silence which the younger seemed little inclined to break, when the falling down of an old green silk blind roused him from his reverie.

"This curious old vehicle," he observed, "doubtless belonged to some noble family. Did you perceive a baron's coronet on the side pannel, and a crest beneath it?"

"Yes, a dexter arm, issuing out of a cloud, and holding a naked sword, all proper, with the motto, Vigueur de dessus—the cognizance and motto of some Norman adventurer, who formerly ravaged this country, and who, like more modern victors, took the sanction of heaven for their deeds of violence, and believed, or affected to believe, that "Dieu est toujours pour les gros bataillons."

"It is the motto and crest of the Fitzadelm family, of the present Marquis of Dunore, the representative of that family," said De Vere.

A silence of a few minutes followed this observation, and the Commodore then carelessly added—"The Fitzadelms! a branch of the far-spreading Geraldines? Yes, they got their portion of this fair province by grant from Henry the Second, to whom they were sewers, as the Ormond family were butlers; and shared with Hamo de Valois, Philip of Worcester, William de Barri, and other Norman adventurers, the princely palatinate of the Macarthies More, once chiefs or kings of Desmond."

"It is in the order of things," said De Vere, coolly.

"Oh! exactly; the 'vigueur de dessus,' which may be translated 'might, not right,' has been the same in all ages; but it is peculiar to the conquest of Ireland, to behold Henry the Second in his camp at Aquitain, distributing to his followers principalities, out of a country he had never seen, a country still in possession of its rightful chiefs, and in which his enterprising marshal, Strongbow, had then scarcely left the track of his footstep. It is curious also to behold the pope, consecrating this robbery, the Irish chieftains disdaining the Saxon king and the Roman pontif, defending, losing, recovering, and forfeiting again their ancient territories; and finally the English lords becoming Irish in feelings, character, and language, and avenging the very injuries they had themselves inflicted, because they had become victims of the same barbarous policy by which their ancestors had been influenced. The causes of Ireland's misfortunes are so deep seated, that every page in her history is a palliation of her faults, and the graver errors of the people will all be found in the misrule of her government."

"Better governed, she would be more prosperous," said the younger traveller, "and less interesting and less amusing. As it is, she is 'melancholy and gentlemanlike,' a thing to make one laugh and cry in a breath. Her history, turned into metre, would dramatize into a sort of tragi-comic melo-dram of mirth and misery, ferocity and fun, that would leave the pathetic grotesque of chrononhotontlogus far behind."

"Them is the Gaulties, plaze your honor," said the driver, "among the clouds. There, Sir, not a mountain in the province will bate them, any how, let alone Mangerton."

"They are, indeed, truly respectable mountains for this little island," said the younger traveller, directing his glance to a range of bold romantic perpendicular acclivities, whose conic pinnacles were lost in the clouds, and whose dark stupendous range might have formed a natural and impregnable boundary between rival and contending states.

At the village of Gaul Bally they found only the ruins of some religious houses, a barrack, and a little Shebean house, where the driver stopped for a few minutes to refresh his horses and himself. They soon recommenced their mountain journey, doubling a formidable ridge, and ascending a gentle acclivity, while the driver, almost throwing the reins upon the horses necks, sat with his arms folded, and recommenced for the twentieth time since they had left Cashel,

"The groves of Blarney, they are so charming"

"This will never do," said the Commodore, letting down the front glass.

"Why, my friend, your horses seem tired already."

"They do, plaze your honor," was the cool reply. "And do you know the raison of that same, Sir? Why, then, it's because they're on level ground, Sir. Sorrow a thing else ails them.

Och! the craturas are kind and lazy like myself, and quite untractable to a smooth level plain; but wait till yez gets up among the glens and precipices. Its then, Sir, you will see them bate the reglar posters, why! entirely; for they knows the ways of the place, and little fear for the chay being left in smitherens,* on the top of a rock, there, or at the bottom of that hollow, down in the divil's glin to your lift, Sir."

* Smitherens; i.e. fragments.
"Its very evident," said the Commodore, "that this fellow is as untractable as his horses. There is a dogged indifference about him, a good-humoured pertinacity of manner, with which it would clearly be in vain to contend; it were best, therefore, to leave him to his song and his waywardness."

"Oh! I hold no contention with travelling contingencies," replied de Vere: "through life, as through a journey, the 'Laissez-aller' is my device. Who would take the trouble of even willing, when a pebble under your chaise-wheel may set volition at nought. Who would contend with accidents and events, uncertain and incalculable as the elements on which they so often depend?"

"This is a fine road, your honors," said the driver, breaking off his song abruptly, and applying his remark to a rude, rough, narrow acclivity, moss-grown and torrent-worn, and becoming every moment more difficult of ascent.
"Balleagh-na-Tierno 'tis called, in respect of being cut across the side of the Galties by the Tierna-Dhu, that is the Black Baron, as they named him in his own country here below."

"Black baron!" said De Vere: "that sounds well among these wild scenes. Does the black baron live in these mountains, friend?"

"He does, Sir; that's he did, but he's dead, Sir, and doing bravely these twenty years and more, and so is his brother Tierna Ruadh, the red baron, that followed him; whose son is now the Marquis Dunore: devil set his foot after them all, for its little good ever they did the country yet, them Fitzadelms!" (5)

The two travellers, as if moved by the same mechanical impulse, started, leaned forward, and then sunk back in the chaise—"At least," said the elder, "it was doing good to cut a road through this wild region, friend."
"Sorrow much then, Sir, any how; in respect of never finishing it, no more nor that inn there, foment you to the left." Here the driver pointed to the ruins of some dreary walls, which added to the desolateness of the scene.

"This Balleagh, I heard tell, was to join the low road, and was made in a great hurry to have a short cut for the Lord Lieutenant and the quality that came down in oceans from Dublin to the stage plays at court Fitzadelfm; and the inn was to bait at; for, barring Lis-na-sleugh, sorrow baiting place in the Galties at all at all; and that was no place for quality to stop in."

"What an heterogenous association of images!" said the Commodore: "mountain regions and private theatricals! A poor Irish lord beginning a work fit for an emperor, and leaving it unfinished, a monument of his uncalculating extravagance, of that wildness and refinement, that uncivilized dissipation, which characterized the provincial nobility of Ireland fifty years back, and arose from the degradation in which they were held."

"Oh, its delicious!" replied De Vere. "I should like to know how the descendant or representative of these noble Fitzadelms would feel, in thus accidentally hearing what we have now heard, and seeing what we see."

"If he was a vain man, flattered and spoiled by fortune," replied the Commodore, emphatically, "he would feel deep mortification; but if he were" — he paused abruptly, and demanded of the driver: "Does Court Fitzadelm lie in the neighbourhood of these mountains?"

"It does, Sir, fifteen miles off, in the valley, down below, between the Galtries and Gotroes, and the Balli-Howries, cribbed round with them and the beautiful Avon fiorne, the fair water, running under the castle bawn, that's all that's left of it, Sir. For shure after the Lord's death it was broken up into smithereens, and scarce a skreed* of it left to the fore."

"And who has carried it away?" asked De Vere.

"Why, Darby Crawley has, Sir, and his father before him, ould Pat; and has'nt left a taste, but what's in their own hands this day. And the chay, your honors driving in, shure it was from him; 'twas bought at the auction. Troth, and if the young lord that got the title, or his brother was in it, they'd be entirely amazed to see their crown and arms running the road this day, that's the Galties, Sir."

To this observation the travellers made no rejoinder. The horses now toiled slowly and painfully up a road, which every moment became more steep and laborious. On either side, the mountain scenery opened into in-- creasing wildness and sublimity. Innumerable defiles boldly diverged to ascending regions, while altitudes still greater, blue, misty, and cloud-cap’d, terminated these natural vistas. The ascent had now become so steep and dangerous, that the travellers had not only alighted, but were frequently obliged to assist in lifting the chaise over deep ruts, cut by the torrents, but which the driver simply, called ‘sore bits.’ He frequently assured them that a little further on, a small quarter of a mile, the lord’s Balleagh* would come down upon the Cloghniagh-Cluain, the lurking place of the noisy water (a torrent he affected every moment to hear) and then they would be upon the low road, which would bring them on the high posting road to Doneraile and Buttevant.

Obliged to pin their faith upon a guide of whom they now began to entertain some suspicion, the travellers beheld one small quarter of a mile succeed to another, and heard and lost repeatedly the fall of many dashing torrents, until, as they ascended among the romantic elevations of the Galties, they lost sight of the inconvenience and tediousness of their journey in their admiration of the scenery. They even permitted the horses to halt in a narrow glen, while they proceeded to examine regions, where nature reigned in all her wildest magnificence; and they ascended from one commanding altitude to another till the whole stupendous chain of mountains broke gradually upon them, spreading far and wide in bold fantastic forms, and in the utmost freedom of outline. As the travellers stood thus occupied at the point of a bold cliff, they suddenly perceived a shadow thrown from their precipitous station, intercepting the blood red beams of the now settling sun, and turning quickly round, they observed a man so close to them, that by a single effort he might have hurled the incautious wanderers down the abyss, they had, a moment before, shuddered to contemplate. He had a bold, strongly defined, but light and flexible figure, not much set off by a ragged frize jacket: his neck was scarcely covered by a loosely tied red handkerchief. In his countenance there was a look of mingled carelessness and intrepidity, of gaiety and acuteness, which is so often discernible in the Irish physiognomy. His hat, worn gallantly on one side, his light arch blue eye and curly luxuriant hair, gave to his whole appearance something of rustic foppery, mingled with an hardy daringness, that was peculiarly characteristic. This unexpected apparition in a scene so lonely amazed without alarming the travellers. When the man asked, with a sort of triumphant laugh, "Doesn't your honors know me then? Shure, a'nt

I your driver, Sirs, that drove you from Cashel in the Kilcoleman chay, below, in the hollow there."

This information rather increased than lessened the surprise his appearance excited. "Only," he continued, "that I threw off my cotamore,* in regard of the heat; and wishing to climb the mountain after you, I changed my old wig and caubeen for this bit of a straw hat, Sir, that I keeps under the chay sate for warm weather, why."

"But with such a profusion of hair, why do you wear a wig?" asked the Commodore.

"Och! because, your honor, it was my ould father's before me, Sir,†—God rest him”—and he crossed himself devoutly.

This mode of accounting for a disguise, more of air and manner, even than of dress, amused, but by no means satisfied the travellers; and secretly convinced that he had some motive for concealing his person in Cashel, they accompanied him in silence back to the spot where he had left the chaise and horses. As they descended the declivities, De Vere observed, "This is what Shakespeare calls 'a fine, gay, bold faced villain:' I should like to know his object in bewildering us in these mountains."

"If he has any," replied the Commodore, carelessly, "it must soon discover itself."

On reaching the hollow, they were surprised and mortified to find that the daylight, which still lingered in tints of purple and gold on the summits of the mountains, had faded away from their vallies.
"Yea may step in now, gentlemen," said the driver: "we have a smooth piece afore us for half a mile, and then we turn into Cloghnaigh-Cluain, and will be on the top of Doneraile in no time."

"We are quite aware that is utterly impossible," said the Commodore, decisively, as he got into the chaise; "but go on as rapidly as possible: we should not like to be benighted in these mountains; indeed, we are resolved not to be so."

"Och! sorrow fear, your honor, any how, of that shure: isn't there an illegant fine moon? and if the worst goes to the worst, is not there the mountain house Lis-na-sleugh, at the foot of the Galties, and the best of entertainment there for man and baste."

"No," replied the Commodore in the same tone of cool decision, "we must reach Doneraile or Buttevant tonight, except we ourselves change our minds, as we proceed."
"Which we shall not do," whispered his companion, "and yet, perhaps shall be necessitated to take up our night's abode in this mountain-house he talks of."

They had in the course of a quarter of an hour reached the long promised turn to Cloghnaigh-Cluain; but the road, though it was a rapid descent, far from improving, became every moment more impracticable, and the twilight more obscure. The driver, at last, after a violent jolt, which threatened dislocation to the joints of the crazy vehicle, suddenly stopped his horses, and coming up to the chaise window, asked, "Yez would not have such a thing as a crooked nail about ye, plaze your honors?"

The Commodore replied in the negative, half laughingly, though with feelings of annoyance, arising partly from suspicion of the man's intentions, and partly from impatience of delay in such a place, and at such a time.
"Why then, murther alive, what's this for?" exclaimed the driver, scratching his head: "the fore wheel off, and not a bit of a nail for a linch pin; and the spring broke too, and not a taste of rope to tie it up with."

"This is a pleasant adventure," said the younger traveller, throwing himself back in the chaise; while the elder, jumping out, examined into the accident: the spring was broken, the wheel was off.

"This is no accident," he said, turning abruptly to the driver: "the linch pin of this wheel has been drawn out purposely."

"It has, Sir?" he reiterated with simplicity. "See that now! why then, I wonder who would be after doing that same; if it wouldn't be your honors, out of sport, Sir. But sorrow much matter, any how; I'd as soon drive your honors with three wheels as four, and did from Cork to Kilworth:—that's father Murphy, Sir; and the wheel will just slip in the front of the chay, fair and aisy, I'll be bound.

"But that's not the worst of it," he continued coolly, endeavouring to force the wheel into the chaise on one side, while Mr. De Vere jumped out at the other: "we've taken the wrong turn, it seems, entirely; for that Cloghnaigh bates the world, in respect of contrari-ness; and when I thought we were in on it, isn't it here the 'wolf's track,' we've slipped into? Dioul!"

"You are to remember," said the Commodore, while his companion was enjoying a rapid combination of every real, fancied, or possible danger, "you told us you were well acquainted with the road."

"And if I wasn't, your honor, how would I know that this is the wolf's track. Och! musha! the likes of this never happened me before. Ochone! Here's your purse, Sir, dear, dropped in the hay;" and he carelessly threw the purse, weighty from containing some golden Spanish coin, into the traveller's hand: he then continued his lamentation over his mistake, at the same time endeavouring to thrust the fore wheel of the chaise through one of its doors. From his tone of voice, peculiarity of manner, and the carelessness with which he restored a purse, that in all probability would not have been missed, every suspicion of sinister intention was hushed in the mind of the Commodore. The younger traveller, however, saw only in the latter circumstance some ruse beyond the ordinary stratagem of a common robber; and whether he was to be enrolled among a band of Shavestis, or stripped and plundered for the benefit of the Caravats, were circumstances debated in his mind, under the influence of many romantic associations appropriate to the scene and hour. Meantime, as the driver assured them, that though they had not taken the best or the shortest road, they were still making their way out of the mountains, they continued to walk in advance of the chaise, without further reproach; while the driver, leading his horses, recommenced his song, which he only interrupted to point out a stone cross under the cliff, that he called the "Hag's bed;" and some other features in the scene, characteristic of its wildness; thus evincing that his boasted acquaintance with the mountains was not an unfounded vaunt.

With that sudden change of temperature incidental to mountain regions, the air had become intensely cold; and through the increasing darkness of the evening, they hailed with pleasure a long level ray of light, which assured them of their approximation to some human abode; perhaps a forge, where they might have their chaise wheel reinstated; and they suggested this possibility to the driver. "A forge," he replied, "then that's the great luck, for if there's a forge, ye can put the night over at Lis-na-sleugh, for there's not a forge in the Galties round, barring the forge of Lis-na-sleugh, where there's the best of fine entertainment, as I hear tell, that's if the chay can't be mended, and yez don't care to get on by moonlight to Buttevant, which yez may after all, plaze God."

"Freedom of agency," said the younger traveller, with a short laugh, "that may sound very well in a metaphysical argument, but here!—we are all the slaves of circumstance, the puppets of events over which we have no control. Observe, we had pointed out Thurles and Tipperary for our stages; we went, we were obliged to go, to Holy-cross, and Cashel. We proposed, we willed, dining in Buttevant,—we are passing the evening, amidst the savage mountains of the Galties! And now, you may depend upon it, bon gré, mal-gré, we shall be fated to stop at this Lis—something, some fortress of the Shanavests or Caravats, Whiteboys or Threshers; our boasted freedom of agency, all reduced to inevitable submission to the intrigues of this masquerading driver, who, by the bye, has again, you see, assumed his disguise."—"Evidently not to deceive us," replied the Commodore. As they proceeded, the light had frequently appeared and disappeared; but as their descent became less rapid, and they advanced more deeply into the valley, it assumed a more steady beam; and the outline of a small building became visible amidst a mass of darkly defined objects: as they approached they perceived it was a little sash window, which emitted the red light of a blazing turf fire; and a volume of white curling smoke, issuing from an aperture in the roof, stained the deep dark blue of the atmosphere with fleecy forms. The moon just shewed her edge above the horizon, and more strongly defined the position of the building, which occupied part of a little plain, forming a point of termination to four cross roads, that branched off round the base of the mountains. Those they had crossed appeared to rise almost to the clouds behind them; and of the many waterfalls, which dashed from the neighbouring rocks, one fell close to the rear of the cottage, dwindling into a rill, and forming a little horse-pool in its front. A light under a shed at a short distance shewed some horses feeding. A bunch of mountain hether suspended over the door, but above all, a post-chaise drawn up before it, which seemed, by its position, to have recently arrived by one of the low roads, designated this wild and remote edifice as an inn. This idea was confirmed by a smart crack of the whip, with which the driver brought up his weary horses, and by his taking off his hat to the gentlemen, and exclaiming, with a courteous bow,

"Why then, long life to yez! yez are welcome to Lis-na-sleugh!"
"So," said De Vere, "I thought so. This, however, is wizzard scenery, and one may compound for a little inconvenience, or even danger, to enjoy it."

The approach of the carriage had brought out from the shed, which served as a stable, a lame beggar, who officiated as hostler, and a ragged boy, who appeared as the substitute for a waiter.

"Here baccah ma vournceen,"* said the driver, who was now once more muffled in his cotamore, his wig, and old caubeen, "take off them cattle for me, while I show the gentlemen into the place. Come, my gassoon, lend me the rush," and he snatched the light out of the boy's hand. "This away, your honors; take care of the sow, Sir: there's a bit of a strame, Sir. Widow Gaffney, ma'am, where are you agrah? Oh, here's the mistress herself. I'll trouble, ma'am, to look after the gentlemen, while I give a squint at th' other bastes.'"

The hostess took the light from him, and he joined the driver of the other newly arrived chaise, who was adjourning from the house to the stable. The Widow Gaffney, with many smiles and courtesies, led the guests from the dark little stone passages which separated the kitchen, clouded with smoke, from another small room distinguished by its plank flooring; exclaiming, as she moved before them, "Och! but your honors is welcome, Sirs. Its a sharp night to cross the mountains, and will have a sod kindled in the chimbley, Sirs, if yez are going stay past the cattle's taking their lock of hay gentlemin."

As she spoke, she lighted, or endeavoured to light, a miserable candle, which stood in a dirty brass candlestick on a shelf over the "chimbley." While thus engaged, the yellow flickering light fell full on her face, and threw her sharp, but handsome features, her deep sallow complexion, and black bright eyes, into strong relief. A red kerchief was tied round her head in the Munster fashion, and the rest of her tall, slight, boney form was hidden in shade.*

The strangers withdrew their eyes from the figure of the landlady, to the apartment into which she had ushered them. Its whitewashed walls were partially covered with those pious prints which are hawked about for sale in the remotest parts of Ireland. The history of many a saint, the sufferings of many a martyr, were here detailed in bright vermilion and yellow ochre; and angels and devils, hymns and homilies, were mingled promiscuously with the amatory history of "Cooleendas," "Croothe-

FLORENCE MACARTHY.

"name;" the "Connaught daisy," the "last dying speech of Captain Dreadnought," bloody and barbarous murders, and a favourite song, called "Ma chere amie," as sung by Mrs. Billington.

A deal table in the centre of the room was still covered with some little pewter vessels, and two glasses with wooden bottoms. The hearth was stuffed with withered heath; and the atmosphere of the room, from which all ventilation was excluded, breathed the fumes of whiskey. The younger traveller, holding his perfumed handkerchief to his nose, asked if there was no other apartment they could occupy, while their horses were feeding, and their chaise mended.

"Och! blessed Virgin," said the hostess, wiping down the table with her apron, "this is the contrariest day ever rose on me! Weeks we'd be, God help us, and not a chay, or sign of quality come the road; and now, because its the fair of Kiltish, and the worlds in on upon us, here's two po-chaises, and not a sowl to help me, only the baccah, and my own little garlagh of a boy."

"We should be glad to go any where where there's a fire," said the Commodore, "the kitchin for instance."

"Och! your honor, that would be a poor place for the likes of you; but if you would demean yourself to step into it, while I kindle a sod here, and ready the place, and takes down these brusheens——"

As she now began to raise a very unpleasant dust by removing the bushes from the hearth, the gentlemen walked at once to the kitchen.

The little inn of Lis-na-sleugh, or the house of the mountain, was the genuine prototype of all such inns in the remote cross-roads, or mountain ways in Ireland; and the kitchen, as is usual in such places, was equally the receptacle of the guest and the beggar; of those who could, and those who could not pay for a temporary shelter. The earthen floor of this hospitable apartment was undulating and broken: a low mud wall, with an aperture in it to see through, screened the fire-place from the door; and the capacious hearth, lined with a stone bench, afforded a comfortable retreat to the chilled or wearied traveller. It was now occupied by a haggard, worn-out looking person, who repeatedly drank from a noggin of water beside him. Above the bright clear fire of mountain turf, built upon the floor, hung suspended an immense iron cauldron, filled with potatoes, not boiling, but boiled and drying (5). In an angle of the kitchen, over a three-legged table, and a little pewter vessel filled with whiskey, sat two travellers; one of them, by the pack which lay at his feet, a pedlar; the other, ill-looking and poorly clad: both earnestly conversing in Irish. Beside the fire-place, on an old settle, were seated two females: one with her long Irish frize cloak, and the hood drawn over her face, exhibited her warmly-mittened hands to the fire, towards which she was turned. The other, stately and erect, her round figure covered in an old fashioned travelling cloak, and her head enveloped in that curious côiffure made and called after the head of a French carriage, and not many years back worn in Ireland under the name of a calesh. From the superiority of their appearance, they were assigned by the strangers to the chaise, which stood at the door on their arrival, and seemed but just to have preceded them.

As the gentlemen stood before the fire conversing in Spanish on the incidents of their journey, calculating upon the probabilities of the future, and making observations on all that surrounded them, the widow having lighted a fire in the best room, returned to await the dispersion of the smoke it occasioned. She leaned indolently over a table, with her hands wrapped in her apron, or as she called it, her praskeen, and cast a glance of curiosity, directed alternately at her guests, in anxious hope that they would call for some refreshment. None, however, was demanded until the entrance of Owney, the driver, broke the spell; for he addressed her with—

"You wouldn't have such a thing as a cuppan * of parliament in the house, Mrs. Gaffney?"

"Och! then, if I would not have that, what would I have, Sir, when I sould the bed from under me to pay the license; and would be sorry to see the barony fined, after the murther we had in the mountains about ould Sullivan's still, last week, and the waylaying of the exciseman, and two men and one soger kilt in the action. Since the attempt at a rescue made for the Rabragh, never was known the likes in the province of Munster, many a day."

Mrs. Gaffney was helping the driver to a little vessel of licensed whiskey, which he had termed a cuppan of parliament, when the ill-looking man, who sate tête-a-tête with the pedlar, asked, "What's gone of the Rabragh, I wonder?"

"Och! Sir, he's about the world again, I hear tell," replied the landlady, "though never saw him, 'bove all the boys in the county. They say, the Ban-Tierna * had him released from prison last assizes twelvemonth, and went herself to the judges at Tipperary, in regard of her being his foster-sister."

* Ban-Tierna, the female chief; literally, the woman of the chief, or noblewoman. This epithet is occasionally applied to female representatives of noble houses.
"Long may she reign," exclaimed the ill-looking man; "for she's a fine woman, and the poor man's friend.—Here's, may she live a thousand years," and he tossed off a glass of spirits.

"Amen," said the driver, moving his hat reverentially as he pledged the toast, in a voice tremulous with emotion.

"I drink to her in water, wishing it was wine," said the poor man in the chimney corner: "for I come from the land where her forefathers reigned. Here's to the Countess of Clancare."

"Why then, if this were the last drop I had in the world," said the driver, drawing his hat over his face, as he advanced in the light, "you shall go my halves in it;" and he presented what remained in his cuppan to the water-drinker, who swallowing it eagerly, observed,

"That's the first bit or sup passed my lips the day, barring a dry potatoe and a draught of water; and came all the ways from the barony of Dunkerron, district of Clancare in Kerry, over bog and mountain, to sell my little bit of an hobby* at the fair of Kittish, to pay the rent of the shed I break my heart under."

"Why then, is that hobby with the saddle your's, Sir?" asked the driver.

"She is," said the poor man, sighing, "to my sorrow: and a finer bit of a baste for bog or mountain journey doesn't breathe, for all I'm carrying her back with me this night; and offered her for a thirty shilling Cork note and a pair of brogues, to a hawker this morning."

"Why then, Sir, see hear," said the driver in a voice full of compassion.

* The little hobbies of this country are the most proper to travel through it; and a man must abandon himself entirely to their guidance, which will answer much better than if one should strive to manage and direct their steps.
"If I had the money, myself, I'd take her off your hands the night, if it was only to hire her out by the job to travellers, and to serve you into the bargain, God help you."

"Then purchase her for me," said the Commodore, who, with his companion, had stood listening to this local and desultory conversation, uttered in an accent so strange to their ears as not always to be comprehended. The bargain was soon struck, and the owner of the hobby, with eyes streaming with joy, and a tongue profuse in gratitude, received a small sum over the price he had demanded.

"I believe," said the elder stranger, addressing him as he counted out his money, "at least I have read or heard, that your barony of Dunkerron was famous for this small breed of horses?"

"And is so, your honor, to this day, and that's all it is famous for now, barring St. Crohan's cell, the patron saint of the barony, hewn out of the solid rock with his own hands.”*

The Commodore leant his head eagerly forward, and in a peculiar tone of voice, said, “And under the hill of Kilcrohan there stands—there did stand, a small ancient building, commanding the bay of Kenmare, once a friary.”

“I know it well, your honor; the chapelry of Glinsky, the school-house of Terence oge O’Leary, and is there to this hour, troth.”

“To this hour?” repeated the Commodore in emotion. “That’s the ruins of it, your honor. After measter O’Leary quit the place, nobody cared to take up

* Smith’s Kerry.—In this hill Antiquarians assert that St. Kieran, the first bishop of Ossory, wrote his rule for monks. in it; and somehow, the times doesn’t favour larning now in Kerry as formerly; and besides, there was an odd story went about the school-house. I dismember me what now; and was a slip of a boy then, and went higher up into Clancare—that’s twenty years ago, aye, faith, twenty-two years, since Terence Oge quit the place.”

“And more,” said the lame beggar, who was filling a sieve with some oats out of a sort of chest near the hearth. “I’ve good right to remember it well, for I was the very man that brought the young lord, that would have been, from Court Fitzadelm to Terence Oge O’Leary’s house, who was his foster father, and gave him all the learning he got, now, young gentleman.”

“Did you?” said the Commodore, seizing his upraised arm; then suddenly letting it drop, he asked in an altered tone, “Did you send for a smith to look to our chaise?”
"I did, your honor, and is at it this moment; and troth, I didn't see that same chaise drive up the night with a dry eye; for," he added, turning to the Kerryman, "it was in that very chaise, which my lord brought his elegant bride in, that I afterwards carried her son, after her death, down to Dunkerron to measter O'Leary's, from whence he never returned dead or alive."

"That's the young lord, was drowned off the Bay of Kenmare, in his own bit of a corragh, and they say haunts the chapelry of Glensky to this hour," demanded the Kerryman.

"Och! to my heavy sorrow," said the mendicant, dropping the vessel he was measuring the corn with, and leaning over the chest, "that was a sore day for me, Sir, for if he was in it this hour, it isn't in this condition I'd be, ould and lame, poor and desolate, and so I tould Measter O'Leary last week, who dropt salt tears when he saw me."
“Last week!” reiterated the stranger; then, with a change of voice, he added, "Were you in Kerry last week, in Dunkerron? I am travelling that way, and should like to know the state of the roads."

"I was not, Sir, in Kerry, and never put my foot in it since I left the young gentleman there, that's the honourable De Montenay Fitzadelm."

"You said you saw O'Leary there, I thought."

"It was down in the Peninsula I saw Mr. Terence Oge O'Leary, your honor, and am but just come from it this day."

"The Peninsula!" repeated the Commodore, "where is that?"

"The Peninsula of Dunore, Sir, on the other side of the Boggra mountains, where the Marquis's castle is, on the sea-side, at the bottom of the country, a lovely fine place."

"I suppose the castle is in ruins?"
observed Mr. De Vere, carelessly—I mean Dunore castle."

"Not at all, your honor, but as good as the day it was built, every stone of it; aye, faith, and better: for sure it was getting ready two years back for the young mad Marquis; but the workmen have been stopped since he went beside himself: and it would have been his cousins that was drowned, only for the villainy of the world that banished the cratur to the wilds of Kerry, as Mr. O'Leary says, and no luck could follow them after that, great as they are now."

"I remember that O'Leary when he was out of his mind himself," said the landlady, "and I a bit of a slip of a girl: he used to be wandering in the mountains here, and bothering the world with the Macarthies and the Fitzadelms, and looking for their ould castles, in lone places."

"Och, then, he's brave and hearty now, Mrs. Gaffney," returned the lame hostler, "and has a fine school in the preceptory of Monaster-ni-oriel. Many thanks to friar Dennis O'Sullivan, the superior; for it was he who took him up, and preached the devil out of him (for they say he was possessed), and set him down there, snug and aisy, in the friary; and allows him to let his own apartment to bathers that come to the salt wather, when himself's not in it: and, troth, you wouldn't think, the day, he had put more than fifty years over his head, that's Mr. O'Leary, though he's sixty right out; for its thirty-four years since his wife got the nursing at Court Fitzadelm, and Terence was twenty-six good then, and a brave lump of a poor scholar, when he missed his vocation,* and married Soosheen O'Calaghan."

"They say it was larning cracked his brain," observed the landlady.

* Vocation—to the priesthood. To miss vocation, always means to fall in love.
"No, troth! but grief for the loss of his foster child; and to this day, when he isn't going on with his Shanaos of the Macarthies More, its of him he bes talking, in spite of the Crawleys." The mendicant hostler now raised the sieve of oats on his head, and hobbled back to the stables.

"Och! but it's a pity of him, the cra-tur," said Mrs. Gaffney, whose evident love of gossipry was much gratified by the conversation which had accidentally arisen—"poor and lame as he is now, a Baccah, begging his bit through the country, and betimes doing a turn here for us: why, then, he has seen great days formerly, and was whipper-in to Lord Fitzadelfm, that's the black baron, and often called in to sing "the hunt of Kilruddery" for my lord and the quality in the great parlour after dinner; and at last lent him even his trifle of wages, and sold his bit of a place to raise money for him, and got his lameness by being thrown off in his service; and there you are now, Fineen Mac Crehan, without a rag to kiver you, or a shed to lay your head under, or a bit of a bed to die on, or as much as would buy a pipe to wake you with, this night. Ah! then, nothing ever thrive with them Fitzadelms: they had the black drop in them, for all they were the portliest men in the country (though I never see them, barring in pictures), and to this day its a saying in the country, 'comely and wicked like a Fitzadelm.' Well, there's the last stick and stone of the court to be sold next week. We had orders to stick up the bill, Sirs, here, from Mr. Crawley's land-baily of Dunore, who passed through the mountains yesterday."

"Then the devil set his foot after him wherever he goes, and that he may never come back, I pray Christ," said the driver, as he drew his cotamore round him, and went forth to look after the equipage.
To this pious adjuration a very general "amen" was returned; while both the travellers, as if moved by the same impulse of curiosity, advanced to read the advertisement hung over the chimney, by the rush-light which was fastened in a cleft stick near it. This paper indicated that the old castle and mansion of Court Fitzadelm, beautifully situate in a valley, watered by the Avon Fienne, and sheltered by the Galties and Bally-howry mountains, were to be put up for sale on a certain day, or might be purchased by private contract. The materials were strongly recommended to any gentleman who was building; and a few acres of meadow land, with the liberties of a certain portion of the salmon fishery on the Avon-Fienne, were to be sold or leased. References were to be made to Darby Crawley, Esq. Newtown, Mount Crawley-Dunore, or at his house, Merrion Square, Dublin.

"I should like to see this Court Fitzadelm," said the Commodore, addressing Mr. De Vere in Spanish.—“Perhaps I may be induced to purchase it. The fishery of a fine river is a strong inducement, and my future destiny I hope is to reside in this country.”

“I should like to see it also, and will accompany you. By its vicinity to the Ballyhowry mountains, it can’t be far from Buttevant,” replied De Vere.

On enquiries made from the landlady, and partly answered by the ill-looking man at the three-legged table, they found that Court Fitzadelm lay due south of the Ballyhowry mountains.

“Then,” said the Commodore, “I can take it en chemin faisant to the peninsula of Dunore.”

“Dunore!” repeated the younger traveller: “I thought you were proceeding to Kerry?”

“Not immediately,” was the careless reply; and the next moment the Commodore, observing that he would endeavour to expedite their journey, left the house. De Vere meantime took out his Spencer, and threw himself upon the settle, in the place of the female in the frize cloak, to whom the landlady was serving out some milk in another part of the kitchen; when his neighbour in the calash, jerking the skirt of her riding cloak forward, which he had incautiously sat upon, observed—"I'd trouble you to move off: you were not so ready to put your comether* on me, when you refused me making a third in the chay, why! from Dublin to Cashel."

Startled at this half-remembered accent, De Vere raised his eyes fearfully, and under the yawning cavity of the calash beheld the red nose and green spectacles of Mrs. Magillicuddy. He sprung from his seat and left the house. "For heaven's sake," he exclaimed, as with rapid strides he advanced to his fellow traveller, who stood talking near the door to the Baccah and the Kerry horse-dealer—"for heaven's sake let us be off directly, with or without a wheel. Who do you think one of the two females at the fire may be?"

"Not your night-mare, I hope," said the Commodore, smiling—"not Mrs. Magillicuddy."

"My night-mare, indeed!" he reiterated, shrugging his shoulders: "this is being fairly hag-ridden."

"Magillicuddy!" repeated the driver of the first-arrived chaise, who was putting-to his horses. "Is that the ould lady's name, your honor? Why, then, troth, she's a gentlewoman every taste of her, and pays finely; and for that same I bate your chay fairly, and got in half an hour before yez."

"Where did you start from," asked Owny, coming forward.

"From Cashel; and came the low road; and wonders yez would take to the mountains; only it's what I believe you lost your way, Sir," he replied.

"And where are you going to now?" asked De Vere, evidently interested in the question.

"We are going on to one side of Doneraile, Sir: and if we can't make that before ten o'clock, we are to stop at the New Inn; for th' ould lady doesn't care to be on the road after the moon goes down, though from this to Done-raile is as beautiful as a bowling-green."

"I think," said Mr. De Vere, "I should be well contented to remain here to-night if there was a chance of clean beds, or even of fresh hether: we could then proceed to Court Fitzadelm early to-morrow, instead of having to tread back our steps by going to Buttevant first." This was addressed to the Commodore.

"Och, then, not better beds you'll get in the barony than at the little backroom at Lis-na-sleugh," observed Owny, who appeared to listen with attention; "and I carried two gentlemen here who slept in them last week, and one of them a priest, that's Friar O'Sullivan, on his way to Cork."

"Then we will endeavour to make our arrangements accordingly," said De Vere, turning sharp round, and coming in contact with the whalebone of Mrs. Magillicuddy's calash; for she had stood for the last few minutes behind them.

"Why, then, man," she exclaimed to her driver, "will you lave off your gossip, and not keep us here till midnight, why!"

To this remonstrance, made in a most stentorian voice, the man replied by opening the chaise door, letting down the steps, and letting in the infirm Mrs. Magillicuddy and her more youthful attendant, who sprung lightly into the chaise after her:—they immediately drove away.
"I told you," said the younger traveller, "we were fated to remain at this miserable little mountain inn."

"The fatality lies in your prepossessions," replied the Commodore, "or if you will, in the super-human influence of Mrs. Magillicuddy; for it appears that your motions are retarded or accelerated, according to your conjunctions or opposition with that most repelling body. She rules the ascendant."

"Well," he replied, shrugging his shoulders,

"In her bright radiance and collateral heat, May I be comforted—not in her sphere."

"And yet," said the Commodore, "she is a woman."

"A woman! Sex hath but one age: that passed, there is neither man nor woman. Who would assign to such a thing as that a gender, with her lungs and her bulk, her natural defects and artificial disgusts, her Bardolph's nose, and tower of horse hair. A woman!"
gracious heaven! compared to the creatures one has seen, to the beings one has fancied, who for a moment have flashed their radiance on one's dreary life path! and this a woman! 'Tis altogether another species, made of other elements, and composed of other organs!"

As he thus stood "chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancies," in apostrophizing all that was lovely in the sex, and all that had ceased to be so, leaning against the door, his eyes fixed upon the silver-lined clouds, that passed in forms various and fantastic as his own thoughts, before the broad bright moon, his more active, more vigilant fellow traveller, was occupied in providing for their night's accommodation. He had also enquired for the driver, to inform him of their new arrangements, and learned from the lame hostler, that he was gone behind the other chaise, as far as the smith's forge, for an iron pin, which was wanting to the compleat reinstatement of the broken machinery of their own crazy carriage.

The circumstance of two such guests remaining for the night at Lis-na-sleugh, produced a business and bustle most unusual beneath its humble roof. Shaneen, the boy, was employed in catching, killing, and plucking a fowl, which had (reckless of the fate that awaited it,) taken up its roost on the rafter of the kitchen. The baccah was occupied in preparing such a table equipage for supper as the house afforded; and the hostess herself gave her attention to the little bed-room.

This apartment, which communicated by a few steps with the parlour, contained two small, old fashioned bedsteads, with patch-work quilts, the accumulated fragments of half a century; and check curtains of transparent texture. Though poor and mean, it was cleanly and cheerful; and was just such a sleeping apartment as is to be found in every inn in Ireland, that lies in a road but little frequented.

When the strangers returned to the house, from a short refreshing walk among the moonlight glens, the house was cleared of its guests, silent and tranquil. A clean cloth was spread upon the parlor table, the turf fire blazed brightly; and though there was no wine to be had, and they had not yet made up their palates to what Peter the Great called "Irish wine," yet the clear spring that gushed from the neighbouring rock was pure falernian to thirsty and temperate travellers. The supper prepared by their cordial hostess, though homely, was all friandise to appetites sharpened by the mountain air, and placed beyond the delicacy of fastidiousness by long fast.

Owny, who had returned from the forge, enquired carelessly "if they had now the place to themselves, barring the gentlemen," and being answered in the affirmative (for the three guests in the kitchen, the horse-dealer, the pedlar, and his companion, had all departed under favour of the moonlight), he immediately threw off his cotamore, caubeen, and wig. Light, alert, and diligent, he now officiated as valet to the gentlemen, and as coadjutor to Mrs. Gaffney's establishment; and his services added considerably to the little sum of comfort and accommodation which the travellers could naturally expect, in this improved imitation of a Spanish Posada.

Meantime the Irish kead mille faltha shone in every eye, and beamed its welcome on the strangers. The obvious goodwill of all compensated for the deficiency of ability, but too obvious; and even the younger, and less easily satisfied guest, was led to observe of the little Shebeen of Lis-na-sleugh, as the French philosopher did of the world, "si tout n-y est pas bien, tout est passable.

* Hundred thousand welcomes.

There is scarcely any cabaret in the remote parts of Ireland, over whose door is exhibited the usual advertisement of "good entertainment for man and beast," where a tolerable breakfast may not be procured; the abundance and freshness of the milk, butter, and eggs usually compensating for the indifferent quality of that far-fetched and vivifying herb, which the widow Gaffney assured her guests was "iligant tay from Cork," as they seated themselves at her breakfast table, after the refreshing repose of the night. Luckily they were just then in a temper of mind to take much upon faith, and to be pleased on very scanty premises. That, which under the influence of exhaustion and evening gloom, was deemed misadventure, to the renovated spirits of morning and sunshine was amusing incident merely, and stimulating variety. There was a novelty, a romantic singularity in their actual position, which lent it a peculiar charm (at least, to the younger traveller, to whom it was evident that whatever was new was good), while it was obvious to both, that even the wildest parts of Ireland afforded security to the stranger's wandering: for it is only the local, official oppressor who has any thing to fear from an ignorant and suffering population; a population, which, strangers to the protection of the laws, fly for redress to that force, by which alone they and their ancestors have been governed for centuries.

The travellers left the inn of Lis-na-sleugh, followed by the blessings of its inhabitants, excited by their liberality.
Had the younger of them been capable of observing any thing, in which he was not himself personally concerned, he might have noticed that, previous to their departure, his mysterious companion had been engaged in a conference with the lame hostler, which lasted for a considerable time: for while Owny was putting-to the horses, and arranging the portmanteaux, the Commodore, with arms folded, brows compressed, and eyes full of eager listening curiosity, remained silently attentive to some narration, which seemed circum-stantially detailed by the baccah. As they both stood under the shadow of an impending cliff, the bold figure of the Commodore in deep shade, and darkly defined, the bending form of the cripple supported by his crutch, and tinged with the light of a straggling sunbeam, they seemed appropriate figures for the wild scenery that surrounded them. In this point of view they were only considered by the tasteful observer, who stood looking at them through his half-closed eyes, and who simply noted the effect of their picturesque grouping, without one surmise as to its cause.—The mountains the travellers had crossed, and the glen in which they had passed the night, soon receded from their view: their journey lay along a comparatively good road, among a long chain of hills, which fenced within their undulating boundaries many a lovely glen and romantic valley, brightening in the morning sunshine. Acclivity rose above acclivity, lifting their bleak bare heads to the clouds, in wild and savage magnificence—those to the west forming the boundaries of the county of Kerry; those to the north and east, the Ballyhowry and Nagle mountains, inclosing the classical scenery of Spencer; his own Mole, rising conspicuously above all.

In the bosom of this wild and fantastic region, after a journey of twelve miles, the valley of Glenfionne, or the fair valley, was announced by the driver; and the old woods and towers of Court Fitzadelm were discovered in the distance, crowning a rocky summit, which seemed to hang perpendicularly over the winding waters of the Avon Fionne. The demesne of this fine old seat was accessible by many mountain ravines from the south; but the design of its late lord, who had cut a road across a branch of the Galties, to facilitate and to shorten the way from Dublin, though inadequately executed, was judiciously conceived. On that side its situation was inaccessible, remote, and romantic. The extensive stone wall, which ran round the north of the de-mesne, forming an opposite barrier to that made by the winding river, was in many places dismantled and broken down; and through its frequent breaches, it exhibited the result of that pernicious and exhausting system of farming resorted to in such places. The ci-devant agent, now the actual but absent master, had let out this beautiful demesne in what is called jobbing farms, whose tillage rarely extends beyond the growing of potatoes; for which purpose the ground is uncalculatingly burned, to produce one good crop to its temporary possessor. Here and there vestiges of wretched crops of grass and oats evinced the land utterly exhausted; and, in many places, it was abandoned to the wild growth of weeds and briars. Almost every where the old meadow and pasture grounds were covered with furze, broom, and rushes, which, though now yellow and rich to the eye, were still but "unprofitably gay."

The subdivisions of petty property were marked by rude meerings, and each temporary tenant had secured his own rood of ground with unplanted mounds, whose occasional gaps were stopped with brambles and heath bushes. This coarse and rude system of farming added much to the desolate and neglected aspect of a naturally lovely scene, which, in its present state, formed an apt epitome of the abandoned dwellings of the Irish absentees.

The scanty and miserable population which appeared in the neighbourhood of the once princely Court Fitzadelm was appropriately wretched and neglected. From a few mud-built huts, raised against the park wall, occasionally issued a child or a pig, while the head of its squalid mistress appeared for a moment through the cloud of smoke which streamed from the door, and then suddenly retreated. The long and broken road which wound round the wall, seemed to lengthen as the travellers proceeded; and they stopped to enquire the way to the nearest approach of a poor man who was driving a lamb with a straw rope round its leg. The man pointed to a winding in the road, and directed them to the ruined gates of the principal entrance: he then took up the wearied lamb on his shoulders, and proceeded sullenly on.

"The cratur!" said the driver, who was now walking beside his horses, as were also the gentlemen: "God help him! he is now going all the way to Ballinispig fair with that bit of a lamb; eight good long miles, and may be it won't bring him over three tinpinnies.''

"There is," said the Commodore, "a mixture of indolence and laboriousness in these miserable people that is singular; they have neither the activity of savages nor the industry of civilization. They want energy for the one, and motive for the other."

"What I should complain of in Ireland," replied De Vere, "is, that there is no rural life; no pastoral manners; no subjects for the Idyls of Theocritus, nor the Arcadia of Sannazaro."

"I would rather see it an appropriate subject for the Georgics of Virgil, the native energy of the people practically applied to the natural resources of the land, was the reply.

They had now reached the entrance of what had been considered one of the most magnificent demesnes in Ireland, once forming part of the principality of the Macarthies, and successively passing by grants and forfeitures from them to the powerful Desmonds, and again to the favoured Fitzadelms. It was now the ill-managed possession of an attorney, who had held it partly on mortgage and partly by lease from the elder Baron Fitzadelm, designated in the country by the sobriquet of the "Black Baron."

The eyes of both strangers seemed equally anxious in their gaze, which was more expressive of obscure and faded recognition than of mere idle curiosity. A long range of iron gate presented itself to their view, much broken, the bars drawn out, and the tracery covered with rust. The massive stone pillars on either side, overgrown with lichens, still exhibited some vestiges of handsome sculpture: the capital of one was surmounted by an headless eagle; the other shewed the claw and part of the body of a gos-hawk, both natives of the surrounding mountains, and well imitated in black marble, drawn from their once worked quarries. Two lodges mouldered on either side into absolute ruin; and the intended improvement of a Grecian portico to one, never finished, was still obvious in the scattered fragments of furzes and entablatures which lay choaked amidst heaps of nettles, furze-bushes, and long rye-grass. The broad approach was still visibly marked out, though now moss-grown and green, winding through beautifully undulating but neglected grounds: and there was a kind of mimic forest, richly cloathing the sides of the elevated hights, which rose, like little mountains, from the southern shore of the river, deceiving the eye, and appearing the same luxuriant wood which had once bloomed there. It was now but the sprouting stumps succeeding to the lofty majesty of the full-grown oak, pine, and mountain ash, for which this country was once so celebrated.

Frequently and recently as the hatchet had been applied to the towering woods of Court Fitzadelm, a few clumps and clusters of very ancient and noble trees were still left standing; but the red marks impressed upon their brown barks evinced that they also were destined to immediate destruction.

While the travellers stood looking upon this fine, but melancholy scene, the driver thrust his head through the broken bars of the gate, and directing his voice towards one of the ruined lodges, whence issued a feeble smoke, cried out, "Alleen ma chree! Alleen deelish!"

"Who do you call to?" asked the Commodore, impatiently endeavouring to open the gate.

"To little Ellen, plaze your honor, the daughter of the poor baccah at Lis-na-sleugh, who lives here with her ould granny, that kept the gates in both th'ould lord's time, and is bed-ridden now: that's as the baccah tould me last night, when I was axing him about the way. Alleen ma yourneen."

"Che shin,"* answered a shrill voice from within; and the next minute a figure, small, wild, and frightful, bounded over the plank laid before the lodge-door, and stood at the gate. To a few words addressed to her in Irish, she lent a timid but fixed attention; then flew back to the lodge, and instantly returned with a large massive key, which she applied with extraordinary strength to the rusty lock; and the heavy gates opened slowly, to admit the unusual visitors.

"That's my caen-buy-deelish,"* said Owny, kindly patting a head, to whose thick and matted locks adhered some bearded thistles. The little portress laughed with all the wildness of futility; but shrunk, scared, and intimidated, as she snatched the offered remuneration from the Commodore's hand. Her countenance, however, exhibited rather the stupor of unawakened intellect, than a natural deficiency of intelligence.

"That's a poor innocent, your honor: the likes of them be always found in lonely places, like the ould court here; and brings luck with them they say. But for all that she's a natural, her father tells me she's the finest cat-hunter and bird-caatcher in the barony round; and is quite cute at gathering brushneens for the bit of fire, and catering among the neighbours with the cruiskeen * and wallet for her ould bed-ridden granny.'

To this account the Commodore made no reply, but shrugged his shoulders; and both gentlemen proceeded in silence through the demesne, while Owny entered the lodge to make some enquiries from the bed-ridden lodge-keeper relative to the house; whether it was to be seen, and who occupied it. The grounds were divided into little plots and job-farms, up to the door of the mansion, which stood on a rocky hight over the river. On the opposite shores ascended a range of well wooded acclivities, whose summits mingled with the line of the horizon. Of the original building nothing now remained but a square ivy-clad tower, called Desmond's castle, flanking a less imposing edifice, built by the Fitzadelms in the reign of James the First. This wing was in good preservation: but the modern façade, raised forty years back by Baron Fitzadelm, the Tierna-Dhu, was ruinous and mouldering. It had been built by contract, was rapidly got up for a particular purpose, and had been constructed with bad materials, most of which were not even yet paid for. The precipitous declivities which swept down from the rocky foundation of the house to the river had been cut into terrace gardens, a fashion still observable at the seats of the ancient nobility of Munster: and it was melancholy to observe the stunted rose-tree, and other once-cultivated, but now degenerate shrubs and flowers, raising their heads amongst nettles and briers, and long grass, and withered potatoe-stalks. Many fantastic little buildings were also seen mouldering on romantic sites along the river's undulating banks; some of shells, some of rock-work: all alike monuments of the bad taste of the day in which they were raised, and of the wanton caprice of the persons who projected them.

"It was doubtless from a scene like this," observed Mr. De Vere, plucking an half-perished rose, to which adhered the foliage of the deadly night-shade, "that Spencer drew his poetical metaphor of the seeds of vice springing up amidst the scions of virtue:"

"And with their boughs the gentle plants did beat;
But ever more some of the virtuous race
Rose up inspired with heroic heat,
That cropt the branches of their scient base,
And with strong hand their fruitful rankness did deface."

"It is thus, perhaps," returned the Commodore, "that the rightful heir of Court Fitzadelm would act, did he behold this place as we now see it."

"No," replied De Vere, flinging away together the rose and the nightshade. "It is probable that the representative of the Fitzadelm family (for the unfortunate and insane Marquis of Dunore cannot be deemed such) would look upon this ancient seat of his ancestors, as I now view it, with a new feeling of contempt for the species to which he belongs; and with as little interest for the posterity that is to follow, as to the ancestry that preceded him, he would put it up to the hammer, and fly to enjoy its price in happier regions and more genial climes."

"He would, on the contrary, perhaps," said the Commodore, with a vehemence tinctured with irrepressible indignation, "endeavour to redeem the folly and negligence of his ancestors, wrest his paternal demesne from the grasp of fraud, or re-purchase it from the gripe of sordidness; he would then raise its fallen towers, reclaim its neglected soil, cherish the miserable population, and expiate the violence and rapacity by which his distant forefathers obtained this still beautiful territory, by a constant and beneficial residence in the land whence he draws his support and existence."

"You know but little of Calista," replied De Vere, smiling significantly—"you know but little of Lord Adelm Fitzadelm."

"Who is he?" asked the Commodore, quickly.

"Why, the only brother of the present Marquis of Dunore, heir presumptive of his title and possessions: not to know him would argue yourself unknown."

"Oh true," said the Commodore, with the tone of sudden recollection, "I have heard of such a person."

"I suppose so," was the dry reply.
Owny now joined them with the information that the house was to be seen, and that it was inhabited by an old housekeeper, a follower of the Crawley family, nick-named Protestant Moll, the 'divil's own saint,' one he had often heard of, but never seen, and so called in regard of her having once been a great Papist and a _Voteen,*_ and having afterwards become a hedger, (that's a turn-coat), and was made a kiln-dried Protestant, by Miss Crawley, a great preacher, and sister to the Portrieve of Dunore, Torney Crawley, Esq. a raal slave driver, that had many a poor man's sowl to answer for. While he spoke, he was vainly applying a stone to the folding doors of the great entrance (for the knocker was off), and at last went round to the rear of the building, in search of a more easy ingress. In a few minutes his head appeared through one of the front windows; and assuring the gentlemen he would be down in a crack, and open the hall door for them, he indulged himself in a momentary view of the surrounding scene. He soon, however, descended, and was heard unbarring the long-closed portals, which slowly opened to admit the strangers. A most capacious hall of black marble discovered on either side several doors, half pannelled; a superb, but dismantled staircase, in the centre, branched off into a corridor, which surrounded the hall, and appeared to lead to different apartments. The rafters had in many places fallen in; and the plaister of the still crumbling ceiling lay in heaps upon the floor.

This ruinous and melancholy appearance gave peculiar force to a motto in gold letters over the folding doors of a private theatre, which opened into the left side of the hall. The motto was “Laugh while we can.”

“Laugh while we can!” repeated the Commodore, with a shrug, that was almost a shudder.
"Oh, its delicious," observed De Vere, ironically, "a thing to moralize a song withall."

"Why then, its little of it them gets now that put it up there, why! that's now, God help them, in a place where there's no laughing, but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

The strangers turned round at this unexpected address, but not unknown accent, and beheld Mrs. Magillicuddy close behind them.

"This is the housekeeper, who will shew your honors the place," said Owny, and then retired to look after his horses. De Vere drew back many paces from the frightful phantom of his imagination. The Commodore stood surprised, and something amused at the effect which this sudden apparition produced on his companion. Mrs. Magillicuddy, whose face was partly wrapped up in a worsted stocking, and who was endeavouring to keep a brown paper steeped in whiskey on her nose, looked at them for a moment through her large green spectacles, and addressed them both in a tone of great familiarity, observing,

"Well, who knows but we may meet in heaven yet; little chance as there seems for some of us now, why! for we've met often enough in this world any how, and may again when least expected. And its little yez thought when ye refused me a third in your chay to Tipperary, that I'd be shewing you Court Fitzadelm; and is as much mistress here as the lady, if she was in it, and will be till it fall into better hands, plaze God. Why then, yez had great luck, gentlemen, not to go in the chay from Dublin; for its in it, shure, I got one of my rheumatrix fits, all down the face and head of me. And it was the Lord's will, I should be overturned last night, coming here, and broke my nose, why! Well, what matter? Shure I'll be worse afore I'm better; for whom the Lord loveth, he chasteneth. Is my strength the strength of stone, or is my flesh of brass? No, troth! And so this young man here tells me yez want to see the consarn. Why then, its a sad place now; a watch-tower in a wilderness. And little ever I thought to see the likes of yez in it again, though many of your sort frequented it formerly."

"Of our sort? Why what do you take us for?" asked the Commodore in some surprise, tinctured with seeming uneasiness.

"For two rakes of quality, dear, going about the innocent country, seeking whom yez may devour, like the old one, why!"

The gentlemen both smiled; and even De Vere seemed not displeased at the definition given of his appearance by the formidable Mrs. Magilllicuddy; alias "Protestant Moll." Still, however, he hung back, and looked upon her with disgust and apprehension.
"I understand," said the Commodore, "that this old mansion, with a few acres of the ancient demesne, is to be sold, and I wish to examine the premises, before I apply for the terms to Mr. Crawley, to whose seat I am now proceeding." "As to the house," said Mrs. Magillicuddy, "it is an house of clay now;" and she waddled before them towards the theatre, the door of which she threw open. "*An house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, and which is crushed before the moth. There!—there's the devil's tabernacle."

Curiosity now got the better of prejudice; and Mr. De Vere approached to examine this monument of former dissipation and refinement, in scenes so inappropriate to its site. Most of the decorations, and nearly all the seats and scenery, had been removed. But fragments of scarlet cloth remained upon a bench, which had not been taken away. A cut wood scene still occupied the stage; and some ornamental painting and gilding were visible on the ceiling and cornice.

"This was a box fitted up for the Lord Lieutenant," said Mrs. Magilllcuddy, seating herself on the solitary bench; "and when the bishop's lady came here to see me, after my wonderful conversion (and it was Miss Crawley that delivered me from the workings of iniquity,) and found the Rev. Mr. Scare'um sitting with me in this very place, (for he came to visit this benighted district, and to take under his protection the perishing sinners of the hill country) says the bishop's lady to me, (for my conversion made a great noise, far and near.) No, says Mr. Scare'um to Miss Crawley, it is curious to see, says he, by what great strides Molly Magillicuddy has made her way out of Babylon. Upon which, the bishop's lady remarked—."

"I cannot stand this," cried De Vere to the Commodore in Spanish. "I will walk down to the river, while you examine the house, if you really think there is any thing worth seeing."

Mrs. Magillicuddy now rose with surprising alertness, and observed: "May be yez would like to see the ould family pictures which will go with the house, being worth nothing now, barring the frames, the best being gone."

The family pictures seemed to counteract the effect of even Mrs. Magillicuddy's egotistical jargon, who seemed to trade upon the history of her conversion, and to suppose, with pious vanity, that it interested her auditors as much as herself. The gentlemen followed her up the hall, while she continued her recital with—"So, as I was saying, the bishop's lady, thinking me a miracle of grace (though, lord help me, I was then but a babe in knowledge, never having listened hardly to Mr. Scare'um, nor lived with the sários), she says to me, 'Molly says she——'" rupted the Commodore, as he threw open the door of the room, which Mrs. Magillicuddy announced as the presence chamber.

"Aye, curish enough!" said she. "Here it was that royal idolater, James the Second, held a court in his way through Munster, and was attended by all the papist lords, the 'recusants,' as Miss Crawley tells me. Oh! she's a great scholar; and was here in her way to Dublin just afore I went to England for that legacy left me by the pious Mr. Scare'um two months ago— for the Fitzadelms," she continued in her digressive way, "was then Romans themselves; until, by abandoning the scarlet lady of Babylon, they secured their lands and rights; and the king, when he looked out at this window (called the king's casement ever since), started back, wondering much at the great hight of the house above the river."
She threw open the window as she spoke; and the precipitous declivity beneath seemed to justify the royal astonishment.* But the strangers were little attracted by the bold and beautiful views without, nor by the fine friezes within, which were painted by the Franchinins, two Italian artists, who visited Ireland a century back, and were employed in ornamenting its noble mansions: the few pictures, which mouldered in their tarnished frames, upon the oaken wainscot, seemed to fix their most earnest attention. They were surprised to find the greater number to be portraits of the most eminent characters of Charles the Second's court.

The beauties, the wits, and the warriors of that day, were in a large proportion Irish; and while the pictures of the Hamiltons, the Butlers, the Villarses, the Fitzgeralds, the Talbots, the Muskerries, the Taafes, the Dongons, and the Burkes, are sketched for immortality in the delightful Memoires de Grammont, their less durable portraits by Lilly and Kneller have been copied ad infinitum* in Ireland, and are still to be found in many of the deserted mansions of the long-absent great. Many of these faded representatives of all that was once lovely and animated lay upon the ground; and the dilettante traveller soon detected "la plus jolie taille du

“And are these pictures to go with the rest of the premises?” asked the Commodore.

“Its little matter where they go,” returned Mrs. Magillicuddy, indignantly, or if they went with them they liken:—a parcel of rakes and harlots! as Miss Crawley tells me; they are paying for their scarlet and fine linen now, I warrant; \textit{for they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.} Fie upon such shameless Jezebels! say I, who look full of nought but worldly vanity and fleshly case."

"Fleshly case, indeed!" repeated De Vere, gazing earnestly upon the picture of the beautiful Duchess of Cleveland.* "There is something in the swimming eyes and thick lips of the beauties of those times, a charming un-idea'd sameness of physiognomy, that is now lost in the female face."

"Mental cultivation most diversifies the countenance," replied the Commodore. "In barbarous nations there is but one physiognomy for a tribe: where there is little intellect, there can be but little variety of expression."

"I hate intellect in women," said De Vere; "and what is most delicious in the harem of that happy satrap, Charles, is, that they all look such pretty idiots, so fond and foolish, as if they were of that sect which once flourished in Spain, the Embevecidos, whose life and faith were made up of love."

"Love, indeed! love! when hearts were purchased with French ribbons; and perfumed gloves went on successful embassies to ladies' affections. Oh! trust me, your royal satraps have more of laziness than of love in their engagements; and nothing is further from passion than their idle saunterings "in ladies' chambers."

"'Tis all abomination! all vanity and vexation of spirit!" said Mrs. Magillicuddy, interrupting the Commodore, indignantly. "I didn't think so once, God help me! For I walked in utter darkness till I was thirty; and did not wrestle with the ould one till I was forty good. My conversion made a a great noise far and near. The bishop's lady came to me, and said———"

Mr. De Vere was again retreating, when the old woman hobbled to a door at the further end of the apartment, and throwing it open, said, "There, that's the drawing-room;" then flinging herself upon a broken chair, the only article of furniture in the room, except an antique japanned chest, she continued, pointing to two pictures—"There, gentlemen, there are the pictures of the two brothers; that is haif brothers by blood, but whole brothers in iniquity.
I always took the dark one in robes to be the Prince of Orange, and the red-headed one to be the Pretender, till Miss Crawley, when she came here for the Indy cabinet, informed me that they were the two last Lord Fitzadelms, the Dhu and the Ruadg, the black and the red. Well, that's all that remains of them now: the ould one had a fine lob of them both. He that would have wrestled for their salvation was not walking this benighted country when they were in it; and so they were left to go to the devil their own way, why!''

During this charitable speech the eyes of the travellers were fixed upon the pictures, pointed out by their pious Cicerone. The elder brother stood in his parliamentary robes, by a table, on which his coronet was placed: his countenance expressed haughtiness, something mingled with indecision; and traces of wild ill-regulated passions, contrasted with a look of feebleness and dependence, gave indication of a mind endowed with some natural strength of character, but which had been spoiled by circumstances and education; as if the natural force, which might have gone to the strengthening of his intellect, served but to irritate his passions and temper. He was of a dark and saturnine complexion; but intemperance had so bloated his features, and impurpled his naturally sallow hue, that the beauty, for which he had once been celebrated, even the painter's art could scarcely recall. This picture was done, by the date, above thirty years back: the name of the artist was so obscure, and the execution so inferior, that it was probably the effort of some itinerant painter, who worked by the square foot.

The younger brother was a true Geraldine in colouring and feature; the light curled golden hair, the full blue eye, and fair complexion, which distinguished almost every branch of that illustrious family, particularly the southern Geraldines: but there was an expression of licentiousness and cunning mingled in the countenance of Gerald Fitzadelm, which belonged not to the physiognomy of his family: he had a foreign air, was habited in a Venetian domino, and held a black mask so near his face, that he seemed but in the very act of removing it: the picture was dated Venice; the name of the artist was Italian; and a label hanging from it, with orders how it was to be laid in the case, which was placed near it, indicated that it was about to be removed. On the case, in large letters, was painted "For the most noble the Marchioness Dowager of Dunore, Dunore Castle."

"Aye," said Mrs. Magillicuddy, reading this address, "aye, to the Marchioness Dowager: well, careful as she is of the picture, its little she valued the reality, why! Its from her, they say, the madness got into the Fitzadelm family. For till the Baron Gerald married that hoity-toity English woman, (though, as I'm tould, they were foolish enough, and wicked enough before) none of them was ever lunatic, until the two young lords, her sons, went mad lately."

"What, both mad?" asked the Commodore; while his companion turned round, and fixed his eyes with a very singular expression on the narrator.

"Aye, Sir, both as mad as March hares: the eldest being mad by nature, and t'other chap, from pride, why! But shure the sins of the fathers must be visited on the childer, as Miss Crawley says; affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble come out of the ground, why! There is the young Marquis in a madhouse, and there is Lord Adelm Fitzadelm, his brother, wandering the world wide, they say, looking for something, he does'nt know what, like a prince in a story book; while his mother, the ould policizing Marchioness, is setting him up for the borough of Glannacrime, here. But, mark my words, she needn't trouble herself; it isn't himself will get it, with the Fitzadelm name, and the Dunore interest to boot."

"No?" said the younger traveller, for the first time addressing this formidable person.

"No, Sir, its meat for his betters, why."

"Indeed!" returned De Vere, with an ironical laugh; "and who may they be pray?"

"Counsellor Con is, dear," said Mrs. Magillicuddy, coming up close to him, with an air of confidential familiarity, while he retreated before her advances: "that's Counsellor Conway Townsend Crawley, nephew to Miss Crawley, and son to the Portrieve of Dunore. Och! that's the young man will prosper, why!"
Mark my words, and you'll see them come to pass yet."

This was said with an oracular nod of the head, and peculiar emphasis of voice: but the countenance of Mrs. Magillicuddy gave no superadded force to her prophetic words. It was indeed pretty well concealed by her broad brimmed hat, her green spectacles, the worsted stocking bound round her rheumatic jaw, and the wet brown paper, that covered her broken nose. While this short dialogue was carrying on, the eyes of the Commodore were glancing rapidly from the features of the late baron, to the face and figure of his young companion; but when De Vere turned round to him, he abruptly averted them, and took up a parchment label, which hung from one of the massive brass handles of the antiquated japan chest: the inscription on it was curious, and ran as follows: "This travelling chest was presented by his most sacred Majesty Charles the Second, to Barbara, Duchess of Cleveland, who bequeathed it at her death in 1691 to her kinswoman, the Lady Geraldine Fitzadelm: she married in 1701 Thomas, Marquis of Dunore, her uterine cousin; and died, leaving issue an only daughter, 1730.”

“Och,” said Mrs. Magillicuddy, who seemed all care and eye to every thing that was said and looked, “och, when every thing went to sixes and sevens, why! and all was ruination, the Black Baron dying in a garret in Dublin, and his brother that came to the title, abroad, it was little regard was paid to the likes of that. But it is now to go by favour of Mr. Crawley, who owns all, to Dunore, as a present to the Marchioness, whenever she comes over: there’s the matting to pack it. They say it was in it, that was found the family tree, which proved the ruined Fitzadelms to be the heirs in the female line, in default of male issue, to the title and estate of Dunore; and to this day there is some curious papers in it. Perhaps, gentlemen, yez would like to see them?"

"Oh very much!" was the instantaneous reply of both. Mrs. Magillicuddy now foraged to the very bottom of her capacious pockets for the keys, crying,

"Weary on them, for keys, they are always missing when wanting;" then suddenly recollecting she had hung them in a closet, she scud off to fetch them.

The strangers again turned their observation to the portraits of the Lords Fitzadelm: but Mrs. Magillicuddy had been scarcely more than two or three minutes gone, when a female voice, with all the flute-like sweetness of the tones of youth, breathed a few clear melodious notes on their ear, as if some skilful musician was running a prelusive division, with equal taste and judgment: but the sounds, prolonged for a minute or two, were as abruptly dropped as begun, and all was silence. The rude war-cry of the Fitzadelsms, or the howl of the long extirpated Irish wolf, would have excited less amazement in the minds of the auditors, than these sweet and most musical strains. By their expressive looks, they seemed almost to doubt their own senses; and they remained for a considerable time silent, and in the attitude of eager and expecting attention. Nearly a quarter of an hour thus elapsed, yet all remained silent.

"Did ever mortal mixture of earth's mould breathe forth such sweet enchanting harmony?" asked De Vere, entranced.

"It seemed to come in a direct line behind that fragment of tapestry," observed the Commodore; and he immediately raised the remains of what once had been a handsome specimen of the Gobelin manufacture. It had, concealed, a small iron door, above which was written, "Evidence chamber." The strangers both looked alternately, and for a considerable time, through the spacious key-hole, and discovered a small rude chamber, dimly lighted by a loop-hole, and perfectly empty. After some time, they looked out of the window, which Mrs. Magillicuddy had called King James's, and found that this Evidence Chamber formed part of the original building called Desmond's tower. Their joint thought was to leap out of the window, and to examine this tower, which appeared to lie open, and to be partly in ruins. But the steepness of the rocks rendered such an attempt impossible.

The shortest and surest way to discover the mystery (for a mystery of the most romantic nature it was asserted to be by De Vere), was to make inquiries of the old housekeeper relative to the songstress of these ruined towers. But Mrs. Magillicuddy, though twenty minutes had elapsed, had not returned; and when they went to seek her, to their amazement and consternation, they found the door locked or bolted, and beyond their power to open or force. De Vere threw himself on the broken chair lately occupied by the housekeeper, in an ecstasy of emotion; his companion, on the contrary, displeased, annoyed, and irritated, as much as astonished, sought round the room for some mode of egress, in impatience and perturbation. A door on one side opened into a dark closet: two windows opposite to the king's casement he tried with considerable strength; but they were nailed down. A third, more manageable, was opened with difficulty; for the pulleys were broken. It was, however, opened, and supported by a broken picture-frame. It communicated with one of the ruined terraces hanging over the river, and cut out of the rock. The height, which was inconsiderable, was easily cleared; but the way to the front of the house was intricate, and not easily found. The narrow irregular path was choaked with briars, with the stumps of old trees recently cut down, and lying at full length, and with fragments of the original ruined building, which had fallen in abundance.

As they proceeded through the entangled screen of underwood and briers, they caught a view of a man seated in a cot (6), on the river near a salmon weir; whose curious construction, with the picturesque appearance of the patient fisherman himself, would at any other time have attracted their attention. It was now, however, chiefly given to their obstructed and difficult path-way, by which they at last reached the front of this irregular and stupendous mansion.
To their increased amazement, they found the hall-door again barred up. Every mode of ingress seemed closed, as when they had first approached it. Their chaise and its driver had alike disappeared; and the little Kerry horse, with the Commodore's valise strapped on his back, was fastened to a tree, and stood peaceably grazing within the length of his bridle; while the portmanteau of De Vere was placed near it, on a clump of rock.

The travellers remained for a moment looking at each other in silence; till De Vere burst into a fit of laughter, nothing less than the ebullition of gaiety. It was almost hysterical, and the pure effect of over-excitement: when it had in some degree subsided, he said—

"So, this is indeed the delightful 'land of faery,' which Spencer has described, in which he wrote, in which he was inspired.—Here his Gloriana seems still to fling about her spells; and new adventures appear in ready preparation for other Sir Calidores and Sir Tristram's, than those of his creation."

"Had we not better," said the Commodore, who for the moment was stunned by the event, which, though not of superhuman agency, appeared in his mind scarcely less comprehensible;—"had we not better go to the porter's lodge, and make some inquiries there?"

"Oh! certainly. But you must not be surprised if the lodge, the portress, and the idiot, are all vanished, together with Mrs. Magillicuddy, Mr. Owny, and the chaise and horses."

The lodge, the portress, and the idiot, remained, however, as they left them. The old woman was seated upright in her wretched bed, with a red petticoat over her shoulders, and employed in knitting. To the repeated questions of the travellers, she replied "Nil gaeliga," I have no English.*

* Literally, the language of the stranger.
Nor could either of them obtain the least information from her. Either she did not, or would not understand them. The idiot, when they approached her, laughed and fled.

Hopeless of information, they walked back to the spot where the horse and their light luggage had been left. They re-examined the exterior of the house; they went round to the postern door by which the driver had entered, and which with some difficulty they discovered: it was padlocked on the outside; and to their repeated knocks the echoes of the sound alone were returned. There was something peculiarly singular, and almost laughably pantomimic in this adventure, which amused, though almost provoked the Commodore; while it defied conjecture to detect the cause of its occurrence. He had reason to believe that his name, person, and very existence, were unknown in Ireland; yet the league of the old woman and driver could not be without object, nor the whole event without motive: it was evidently unconnected with any sordid or dishonest view. The housekeeper had not been remunerated for her trouble, nor the driver for his horses or attendance. Rapid in his silent cogitations, and quick in his decisions, he at once determined that the object of this farcical embroglio was the fanciful and accomplished ideologist, with whom he was accidentally connected; and giving further conjecture to the winds, after a few minutes reverie, he proposed that they should hail the fisherman at the weir, engage him to convey the younger traveller down the river, as near as he could to Doneraile or Buttevant: for himself, as the day advanced, and time pressed, he determined to mount his Kerry steed, and proceed by the mountain route, he had obtained from Owny, to Dunore.

To all these arrangements De Vere passively assented; and while the Commodore, with the activity of boyhood, bounded down the precipitous rocks to beckon the fisherman towards the shore, his companion, with folded arms, and eyes fixed upon vacuity, stood the image of one, in whom

"Function is smothered in surprise,
And nothing is but what is not."

The events of his journey had combined themselves in his mind under the influence of the most morbid imagination, and the most inordinate amour-propre. His vanity and his fancy had worked out a series of associations and conjectures most favourable to the character of both. Every event, every object, however unimportant in itself, was by him wrought into a miracle, or meditated into a mystery, through the medium of his singularly organized mind: "from trifles, light as air," he had the unhappy power of constructing fabrications of ideal pain and pleasure, of flattering or mortifying importance; which rendered him the victim of delusion, and covered the prosperous realities of his life with shadows, alike illusory and unsubstantial. The perverseness of his journey from Dublin, the counteraction of his intentions with respect to his route, the impish laugh in the ruins of Holy-cross, his unintentional visit to Court Fitzadelm, the invisible musician of the Evidence Chamber, his reiterated contact with the formidable Mrs. Magillicuddy, the youthful figure of the female associated with her at Lis-na-sleugh, the masquerading mystery of the driver, and, above all, the league evidently subsisting between the old woman and Owny, and their sudden disappearance from Court Fitzadelm, unremunerated for their respective services, all these incidents, so strange, so unexpected, combined themselves in his meditations, till he believed himself caught in a thraldom, like that, "Dove in dolce prigione Rinaldo stassi," the object of some deep-laid project, of some romantic design, in which there would be little to mortify his vanity or to disappoint his feelings. The scenes he now inhabited were to him all fairy-land, and he believed that the Armida was not far distant, whose

"Teneri sdegni, e placide e tranquille
Repulse, cari vezzi, et liete paci Sorrizi, paroletti," were to compensate to him for the disgusting agents she had employed in her service, and who had by no means "done their spiriting gently."

He had resolved, in his own mind, to take up his residence in some town or village in the neighbourhood of the Court, and there await the issue of an adventure, of which he alone could be the object. Notwithstanding his very ardent admiration for his compagnon de voyage; the personal distinction, and almost heroical cast of character and physiognomy of the extraordinary stranger, it never once suggested itself that he also might have had some share in this extraordinary event. He was alone the hero of his own thoughts; and, with the hypochondriacal egotism of Rousseau, he believed himself an object of occupation, of amity or enmity to the whole world.

This train of thought was, however, soon broken, by the return of the Commodore, followed by the fisherman, who took charge of his valise, and stowed it in his little boat. He had engaged to row the younger traveller down the river, to its confluence with the Avonbeg, which ran by Doneraile, and which was the oft celebrated Mulla of Spencer, where

"On each willow hung a muse's lyre."

But the curiosity and interest excited by Kilcoleman, the Mole, and the Mulla, were now absorbed in feelings of a profounder emotion; and his approximation to the shrine of his pilgrimage no longer awakened transports in the mind of the fanciful pilgrim. As the travellers walked together to the river's side, the elder observed, "I have been making inquiries from the fisherman; and it appears that an old woman, who had the epithet of protestant Moll, and kept the mansion, where there is nothing to tempt to depredation, has been dead for some weeks. The house is unoccupied, and the approach by which we entered is the least frequented, there being several others, all open: Mrs. Magillicuddy is, therefore, some Ariel correspondent to command,' of a concealed Prospero."

"Ariel!" reiterated De Vere; "the foul witch Sycorax, rather."

"Now, place your honor," said the boatman, as he drew up his boat close to a ruin, which he called the battery. With some difficulty De Vere was placed in the cot, which was one of the smallest construction known by that name. The boatman, with his spoon-shaped paddle fixed against a jutting rock, for a point d'appui, was pushing off from the muddy shore: the figure of the Commodore was thrown into muscular exertion, in endeavouring to assist, and the cot was just afloat, as he seized the extended hand of his unknown fellow-traveller.

"We part," said De Vere, in a tone of emotion, "almost as we met."

"Almost," replied the Commodore, returning the strong pressure of his hand, with a grasp still stronger, but in a tone not firmer.

"Farewell, farewell!" repeated De Vere, as the boat cleared the banks; and he moved his hat, with an air of almost affectionate respect, half repressed by habitual apathy.

"Farewell!" returned the Commodore, with a mingled expression of courteousness and cordiality, returning the salute.
The little bark glided into the centre of the sunny stream. He whom it left behind in scenes so dreary ascended the point of a rock, which commanded the winding of the river: his eye pursued the cot, as its paddles threw up the sparkling waters, and as it appeared and disappeared amongst the projecting cliffs, or glided under the shady alders, which fringed the lovely shores of the Avon-Fionne. It soon became a black speck in the water, and finally disappeared in a bend of the river. The Commodore, with a short involuntary sigh, turned away his dazzled gaze. The gloomy, desolate demesne of Court Fitzadelm spread around him,—he the sole occupant. “Alone!” he exclaimed aloud,—“once more alone, and where?” He glanced eagerly, anxiously, almost wildly round him. His respiration was short: emotions, long repressed, seemed to find vent: he threw up his eyes to heaven, and clasped his hands, almost convulsively: years and scenes of distance and remoteness passed, in thick coming visions, before his memory; then by a sudden effort of volition, as one he changed at once his mood of thought, and elevated position, and descending rapidly from the rock, sprung upon his horse, galloped towards the dismantled park wall, cleared it at a leap, and proceeded on his way to the Peninsula of Dunore.

Whatever was the mission of this mysterious visitant, to a country for which he evinced so deep an interest, he seemed to forbid time's anticipations of his views; and in all things, and upon all occasions, appeared habitually to act as one who thought

"The flighty purpose never is o'ertook, Unless the deed go with it."

Taming of the Shrew.

The Commodore pursued his solitary way to the peninsula of Dunore with as much rapidity as the nature of his mountainous road would admit. He had enquired the route both from the baccah and the driver; and to their various, and not always accordant instructions, clearly arranged in his memory, he added his own judgment, and such information as he could occasionally glean from the passengers he accidentally met.* These, however, were few;

* In Ireland, it is extremely difficult, to learn either the way or the distance, in performing a for as he proceeded among the mountains, by roads only passable during the autumn, the population was so scanty, that in the course of many miles, ambled over by his admirable little steed, he met only with three individuals; a boy carrying a couple of chickens for sale to a distant market, a woman with a few hanks of yarn, proceeding to the same rustic emporium, and a priest, bearing the viaticum to a dying penitent, whose temptations to err, amid scenes of such privation, could not have been very numerous.

The priest courteously joined, and accompanied the lonely traveller on his route; and might have been deemed an acceptable Cicerone, in a region, which, however rude and savage, was not journey by the cross-roads, or mountain paths. In remote places, it may be literally said, that "the way lengthens as we go," since every one, of whom inquiries are made, adds a mile or two to the original distance.

wholly destitute of something like classic interest. In the dialect and accent of the province, intermingled with a few French and a few Latin words, he pointed out, here a Cromlech, and there a cairne, a Danish fort, or a monastic ruin, and added such scraps of antiquarian tradition, as are to be found, even in the remotest places in Ireland; where the superstition of the people lends implicit faith to all that is marked by miracle, and their national vanity to all that is stamped with antiquity. The legend of St. Olan's cap was repeated, as a distant view was caught of St. Olan's abbey. Its miraculous efficacy, still acknowledged by the peasantry, and the belief of its having returned of itself to the spot from whence it had been removed (though composed of an immense hollow stone), was circumstantially recorded. One of the defile castles of the great Macarthies, called The Fairy's Rock, or Carig-na-Souky, was pointed out, in the distance, on the summit of a cliff, which hung above the ravine it guarded. The ruins of St. Gobnate's church, rather guessed at than clearly distinguished, introduced the legend of that fair saint, with the episode of the history of the stone cross, still extant among its ruins, where a far-famed rood of the Virgin was once kept, and where still a stone, fixed near it, in the earth, exhibits the impression of many a penitent pilgrim's bended knee. For the rest, the communicative and courteous priest gave the Commodore some excellent instructions as to his future route, and lamented that he had not taken a road, which, though more circuitous by nearly a day's journey, was far less intricate than the one he had chosen. This he asserted to be a bird's flight route from the north to the south of the county, a bridle-way or car-track, cut, time immemorial, by the mountaineers; for the purposes of rural economy, and communicating among the neighbouring districts.

At the conjunction of four of these mountain defiles, marked by a large stone cross, placed over a holy-well, hung with ragged offerings, the priest departed, with a cordial benedicite and a bow, learned in his French college, some thirty years before, and not yet forgotten in the wild scenes, where his laborious and ill-requited calling placed him.

The traveller, again left alone, proceeded by the direction of the priest to a little mountainous village, called the Town of the Beloved, in Irish, Bally-navourna. It was silent and solitary, and seemed to sleep in the noon-tide sunshine, as if placed there only to form a pretty feature in the romantic scenery. Its inhabitants were all abroad, getting in their scanty harvest in a neighbouring valley. When the Commodore, after resting and bating his horse at a little public house, lost sight of its moss-covered roofs and curling smoke, no further vestige of human habitation cheered his sight for many hours. Meantime his road became every moment more rugged, wild, and difficult. The extraordinary instinct of the little animal upon which he was mounted, and which seemed as peculiarly organized for the region it occupied, as the camel for the desert, or the reindeer for the snows of Lapland, excited an admiration not unmixed with gratitude and respect. The traveller, rather abandoning himself to its guidance, than attempting to direct its steps, fearlessly permitted it to climb among the rugged rocks, to skim over trembling bogs and sloughy morasses; and it still preserved its pleasant ambling pace, where other horses would have sunk knee-deep, and was able to proceed where they would have perished.

The sun was now hastening to its goal; the few birds of prey which inhabit these elevated regions were returning to their eyries among the rocks. The traveller had still to seek the landmarks which the priest had described as designating his descent to the Peninsula of Dunore. He indeed caught glimpses of the Atlantic ocean, through the interstices of the mountains; but the evening shadows were gathering in vapours beneath his feet, as he descended, and yet he approached not the mountain's base. That he had missed his way, and might be benighted in a region so desolate, had suggested itself as a possibility; and he alighted for the purpose of ascending an high cliff, which seemed to command a vast extent of prospect, to ascertain his exact position. As he was in the act of fastening his horse's bridle to the stump of a furze bush, sounds, measured and mechanical, met his ear, and spoke of human proximity: they came from a little glen, near whose entrance he stood. A narrow bridle-way, leading through a deep ravine, presented itself: on the summit of a stupendous rock, some fragments of a ruin were visible; and beneath, seated in a sort of dry dyke, appeared a man occupied in scraping away with a sharp flint the lichens and mosses which incrusted a large angular stone, in order to decypher an inscription which he was endeavouring to copy. The characters were Irish, and beneath appeared a translation, in not very pure Latin, intimating that “NEAR TO THIS PLACE, AT THE CASTLE OF MACARTHY, THE STRANGER WILL RECEIVE AN HUNDRED THOUSAND WELCOMES.”*

The person who was engaged in this antiquarian occupation was so intent upon his task, that the approach of the Commodore was unobserved; who stood gazing upon him with a look of singular and marked expression, as if he too was penetrating through the veil of time, and gradually recalling traces, and deciphering lineaments, which its mouldering finger had touched with decay, but not wholly defaced. There was an emotion of tenderness softening his countenance, as he gazed, foreign to its habitual expression; and when, leaning forward, he read aloud the Latin, and added the comment of—"I believe there is a false concord in that sentence," his full, deep voice, wanted its usual tone of firmness and decision.

As he spoke, the flint dropped from the hand of the solitary sage, and he remained for a moment, in the motionless position of surprise, tinctured with apprehension; as if some "airy voice, that syllables men's names," had suddenly addressed his unexpected ear.
The traveller saw the effect he had produced, and endeavoured to counteract its consequences, by assuming a careless and familiar tone.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "for this intrusion on your learned researches: I am a stranger in this country, and I fear have lost my way: I wish to reach the town of Dunore before nightfall, and you will render me a service in pointing out to me the nearest road."

This speech, evidently, recalled courage and confidence in him to whom it was addressed; and he slowly arose, putting the flint into his pocket, a cork into the ink-horn pendent from his button hole, and fastening a roll of paper and a pen into the cord of his hat, while he repeated,

"A false concord! sure enough; a stranger in the country!" He was now on his feet: the Commodore stood opposite to him, with his back to the setting sun, his figure cutting darkly against its brightness; his face and features in deep shadow. The yellow light of the illuminated horizon bronzed the grotesque figure of him on whom he gazed. This person was of a low and clumsy stature; but, though evidently passed the middle age of life, was still strong and hale: the deep crimson of health burned on his slightly furrowed cheek; and his countenance gave indications of mingled simplicity and acuteness. There was also a certain indescribable quaint, solemn, dogmatizing importance in his look, and a wandering wildness in his eye, which were curiously and strongly contrasted; while his costume added to the characteristic peculiarity of his person. A very small wig of goat's hair surmounted a few thick, bushy grey locks, which curled round his short neck, for his shirt collar was thrown open; and three coats of frize, of various colours, excluded, like the cloak of the fabulist, both wind and sun. As he now stood, affecting to button up these coats, one after the other, he was, in fact, earnestly engaged in endeavouring to make out the traveller's features, on which his eyes were intently fixed.

"It's long," he at last observed, "since your honor was in these parts."

"I never have been in this district before," was the reply.

"Haven't you, Sir? then I renage* my remark, and requist your honor's pardon. I'll shew you the way to Dunore, Sir. I'm going it ever' rood myself, and lives a donny taste beyont it."

As he spoke, he shifted his position, with the intention of obtaining a better view of the stranger's face; but apparently, in order to draw forth a ragged colt from a rocky shed: the Commodore at the same moment shifted his, and led forward his Kerry steed.

"That's a reyal asturiones," observed his new companion, "and comes of a breed of jennets brought over by us from Spain, on our way from Phœnicia: they are named Hobillers by Paulus Jovius, and Automates by Tournefort: they are of pace aisy, and in ambling wondrous swift. Its little the English Edward would have done at the siege of Calais, but for them same Irish Hoblers. Not that we were beholden to the likes of them; having our war steeds and our chariots.

"Infrenant alii currus aut corpora saltu Subjiciant in equos."

He was now mounted on the back of his own steed; and his eyes were turned with a fixed look on the Commodore's marked profile, who rode with his head somewhat averted beside him: the view he thus obtained was dim and uncertain; but still it seemed to fix his attention: there was, as he gazed, an uncertainty in his look; a something of slow, doubtful, vague recognition, as if the faint and indistinct resemblance of some features, once known, crossed his apprehension; now lost, now caught; determined by a light, a shadow, a motion, and flitting as soon as seized. As they descended into the deepening twilight of the glen, the obscurity of half-forgotten traits thickened into darkness; the clue of association was lost, and the hitherto silent spectator withdrew his eyes, with the simple observation,

"I could swear upon my soul's salvation, that I had seen your honor afore, Sir: I disremembers me where, but that cometh of my memory, which faileth me for present things; forgetting by times that my own name is Terence O'Leary, which is remarkable."

"O'Leary!" re-echoed the Commodore, in a voice of almost boyish softness and extreme emotion.

"Who calls?" exclaimed O'Leary, wildly, and suddenly checking his horse: "Who calls?" he repeated, turning full round, and throwing his strained and wandering eye in every direction.

"It was I who repeated the name you announced to me, Mr. O'Leary," said the Commodore, in an altered and careless tone.

"Was it your honor?" resumed O'Leary, after a pause, and a deep inspiration. "I thought it sounded like a voice I sometimes hear close in my ear, Sir, when I am alone in the mountains. They tell me 'tis my fetch;* but I have heard it these twenty years, and am to the fore still—its no fetch," he added with a deep sigh: "its only an ould remembrance."

His head sunk upon his breast, and they proceeded in silence to the edge of the glen. It terminated abruptly in a sloping surface of rich and mossy turf,

*It is a common superstition in Ireland to believe that a mysterious voice heard in lonely places gives notice of approaching death—it is called a fetch.
beyond which the sea-bathed track of land, called the Peninsula of Dunore, spread at the mountain’s foot, extending to the ocean, undulating with green slopes, intermingled with rocky elevations, and combining many views of maritime and inland scenery, eminently beautiful and romantic. The descent, however, was so steep, and so difficult from its smoothness, that the travellers alighted and led their horses.

"There forenent you lieth Dunore, as it is called now," said O’Leary, with emphasis; "one of the tongues of land on the coast of Munster, so named by one Mr. Camden, a Saxon churl. But its true and ancient name is Dangan-ny-Carthy, the fastness of the Macarthies, the kings of the country round, of the Coriandri and the Desmondii, and blood relations to the Tyrian Hercules, every mother's son of them."

"Indeed! that is an illustrious descent!"
"Troth, and deed: for was not Malech-Cartha, the King of Tyre, says Bochart, which manes Malachi Macarty; that's plain, I believe, any how: and defies Geraldus Cambrensis, Dr. Ledwich, and Sir Richard Musgrave, with Saxo Grammaticus to boot, to deny that: and would have been kings of Desmond to this very hour, if right was afore might, and only for the enticing bates of the English to entrap them in their policies, their plots, and their complots—their playing fast and loose, their English earldoms and English patents, their grantees, and protectees, and governorships, until the Macarthies degendered with the rest, from their ancestors, and never rose to great power from that day forth—that's Florence Macarthy I mane, the fogh-na-gall, the Englishman's hate,* elected to the style and authority of Macarthy More, 1599, even after he descended to be made Earl Clancare, anno 1565, Elizab. reginæ six."

"Florence?" said the Commodore, dwelling with a peculiar expression on the name. "Florence then is a name given both to the males and females of this illustrious family?"

"It is, plaze your honor, and comes from the Spanish name Florianus, which the Macarthies brought with them on their way from Scythia, as also the O'SULLIVAN BEARS."

"It is an Italian name also; and one Florianus del Campo has, I believe, written on this country," said the Commodore.

"He has, Sir, belied the land, like the rest of them," replied O'Leary.

"The Macarthies followed the fortunes of the house of Stuart, I believe, Mr. O'Leary; at least I have some where read so."

"They did, Sir, to their great moan. Of all the regiments after the surrender of Condé, Macarthy's alone refused entering the Spanish service, till their colonel got his dismissal in France, from the ra'al King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland."

"They have, however, since distinguished themselves in the service of Spain; and even in the popular cause of South America."

"They have, Sir, and everywhere but at home, God help'em, for a raison they have."

"Do any of the family now remain in this county?"

"None at all," said O'Leary; and then, after a pause, added, "barring the Bhan Tierna, who isn't in it at this present."

"Ha! I have heard that epithet, accompanied by blessings in the mountains of the Galties: to whom does it belong?"

"To whom does it belong, is it—why, to whom should it, but to the grate ould ancient Countess of Clancare, anno 1565, Elizabethæ 6.—But sure, what signifies talking about them now. You may see it all in my Genealogical History of the Macarthy More, written in the Phœnician tongue, vulgo-vocato Irish; it being more precise and copious than the English, and other barbarous dialects; also sharp and sententious, offering great occasion to quick apothegm and proper allusion; the only pure dialect remaining of the seventy-two languages of Babel, introduced into Ireland by Finiusa Tarsa, the son of Magog, King of Scythia, from his own seminary of Magh-Seanair, near Athens; and is to this day the ould language, spoken by Hannibal, Hamilcar, Asdrubal, and the Macarthies More of county Cork and Kerry, anciently Desmond—and taught in my seminary, in the ould preceptory of Monaster-ny-oriel, according to the Bethluisnion-na-Ogma, with Latin and Greek, and other modern dialects.”
"And yet," said the Commodore, with an half-repressed smile, "there are some sceptics of opinion that there has always existed a perfect identity between the Irish and the Anglo-Saxon; that in fact the Irish received their ancient alphabet from the Britons; and that their pretensions to an eastern origin is a groundless notion, generated in ignorance, and idly cherished by a mistaken patriotism, which might be better directed."

"Oh murther!" exclaimed O'Leary, clasping his hands: "the thieves of the world!"

"O tribus Anticyris caput insanabile!"

Then suddenly mounting his horse, with a look of mingled indignation and pity, directed at his unknown companion, he added, pointing to a road which wound down a woody hill, "there's your way, Sir, to Dunore town. If you cross the river at Ballydab bridge, you can't miss it."
He was trotting off, muttering to himself some broken exclamations in Irish, when the Commodore, who also had resumed his horse, followed him, and said,

"In detailing the opinions of others, I do not give them to you, Mr. O'Leary, as my own: you are to observe, I speak not to dictate, but to learn."

"Why then, Sir," said O'Leary, soothed by this conciliatory observation, "I'd be loath to see the likes of you, or any gentleman, enticed by them traitors of the world, who come as espials on the land, and go forth to defame it; for sorrow one of them English but hate Ireland in their hearts: and there's an ould saying in Irish, which manes, 'keep clear of an Englishman, for he is on the watch to deceive you.' I wouldn't give a testoon* for the whole boiling of them, troth, I wouldn't. The Irish not brought over by our Celtic Scythean ancestors! Bachal essu!* they might as well take St. Patrick from us, and deny that the potatoe is the plant of the soil.'

"I am afraid, Mr. O'Leary, they would go near to do both."

"Oh! very well, Sir: I see you are one of them that would go ould Strabo on us, and Saxo Grammaticus, and Dr. Ledwich."

"Nay, I speak as one ignorant of the subject, and desirous to obtain information. If there were now, as formerly, such seminaries to study in as the school of Ross Alethri,† or such sages to study under as those sought for by the learned Monk Ealfrith, who came from Britain for that purpose, I should like to become his disciple."

"To say nothing," said O'Leary, "of Agelbert, bishop of the west Saxons, Alfred, king of Northumberland, and the blessed father Egbert, and the saintly brother Wigbert, who for the love of the celestial Isle, quit their kin and country, and retired to Ireland to study."

"But what cell," asked the Commodore with emphasis, "what preceptory, what academy is there now open to the lover of Irish antiquities, where learning and retirement could for an adequate compensation be obtained together, by a stranger who thirsts for both?"

"There is," said O'Leary, after a short pause, and in a voice full of importance, as he drew up close to his companion—"there is, plaze your honor, a place called the Monaster-ny-oriel; an old ruin, but a larned retreat. And if there was a gentleman, who, for the love of Ireland, would put up with homely fare, and be satisfied to be howsel'd with an old Senachy, or genealogist, why then—"

"O'Leary," said the Commodore, laying his hand familiarly on his shoulder, and eagerly interrupting him, "should you receive me as your guest and disciple, you will find me not difficult to accommodate: my ostensible business in this barony is with a certain Mr. Crawley, but—"

"With who?" asked O'Leary, recoiling in horror, "with one Crawley, did you say?"

"With Mr. Crawley of Mount Crawley."

"With him! the land pirate! then, Sir, you cannot housel with me, and so I wish you luck."

With these words, O'Leary, spurring on his little nag, trotted abruptly down a craggy glen, and disappeared. The Commodore stood looking after him till he was out of sight, and marked the path he had taken. Then with a deep-drawn inspiration, as one, who after some enforced restraint, breathes freely, and with a smile almost characterized by sadness, he bent his course towards the town of Dunore.

As the descent of the mountain softened into an undulating valley, the approach to this town became extremely picturesque. The conjunction of many mountain streams formed a considerable river, which flowed under the single arch of an antique bridge, covered with ivy, which stood at the entrance of a poor, but pretty village, announced by a turf carrier in answer to the Commodore's question, to be Ballydab. A rude bleak mountain, which overshadowed this village, and projected into the sea, formed a bold head land. At the distance of two Irish miles, the road joined the high road from Cork and Dublin, and wound to the left of a group of new unfinished houses, the embryo of some rising town, haply intended to eclipse the fading glory of the decaying and ancient village of Ballydab. Within a mile of Dunore, the road proceeded by the edge of the bay, at the head of which the town stood, and then appeared to wind along the coast. The town itself (once of note, and of historical interest), was approached by a stately avenue of trees. Its ancient, but well preserved castle, terminated its narrow street, and presented a striking feature in a scene now tinted by the silvery rays of a cloudless moon. The castle casements were lighted with a fairy illumination by its beams; and the rippling tide, tinged with the same colouring, gave a gentle motion to a few fishing vessels, which alone occupied a port, once of considerable trade with the opposite shores of Spain, Portugal, and Italy.

As the Commodore rode up the street, it was already still and noiseless, save the barking of a dog, which the echo of the horse's feet had roused. Two lanterns in the front of two opposite houses marked the site of the rival inns. That to the right had a new and gaudy sign flaunting in the breeze; and, under a profusion of gilding, yellow ochre, and whitelead, was written The new Du-nore Arms.

The faded sign of its inferior competitor exhibited a dancing bear, scarcely distinguishable, under which was written, in large fresh black letters, This is the real ould Marquis of Dunore. The Commodore chose the real old Marquis; and a tolerable supper, and a clean bed, left him nothing to repent of his election. The next morning, fatigued by his mountain ride, he rose late; and was surprised to find upon his breakfast table a note, directed "To his honour, the gentleman at the ould Bear, who arrived last night, these."

He opened and read as follows:—
Right honorable,

According to the advisement of my better judgment, I herein complicate with your requisition this tyme, in regard of the lodgement in the Friar's room; videlicet Fra Denis O'Sullivan, superior of the order, now in Portugal, via Cork, where he bides at this present writing, pending the visitation. He being likely to put the autumn over in foreign parts, the place thereby being vacant, the floor clean sanded, and the stone belted window giving on the sea-coast, ill be-fitting your honor howsoever, or your likes, being righte worthie of Dunore Castle, which is nothing to nobody, sithe your honor think it fit. Touchinge the pintion thereof, should your honor consent to housel with me, it shall be left to your honor's liberalities; the lucre of gain, but little weighing; and if there be juste cause of complainte touchinge ye unruliness of my scholars, or any rabblement on the part of them young but larned runagates, they shall, on your honor's so deposing before me, their plagosus Orbilius, undergoe chastisement in due austeritie: so praying an answer forthwith,

I remaine,

With humble commendations,

Your honor's dutiful servant,

Terentius Oge O'Leary.

From my Preceptory, Monaster-ny-Oriel."

Whatever might have caused this sudden revolution in the sentiments of Mr. O'Leary, it evidently excited much pleasure in the person in whose favour it had occurred; and on learning that one of O'Leary's academicians, or "larn-ed runagates," awaited an answer, he sent back a verbal one, intimating his intention of riding over immediately to the Preceptory of Monaster-ny-Oriel, after he had taken his breakfast.

On passing through the town, on his way to O'Leary's, the Commodore was struck, not only with the antiquity, but with the Spanish character of its architecture. Many of the better sort of houses had stone balconies, with windows and door frames of dark marble. The church was dedicated to St. Jago de Compostello, and was raised (as an inscription on the gate indicated) by Florence Macarthy, Earl of Clancare, on his return from a pilgrimage to Galicia: it was called in Irish the church of the vow, and was afterwards largely endowed by a company of Spanish merchants, who had settled in Dunore, in the reign of Elizabeth. It was afterwards the protestant parish church, and became much decayed and ruinous. A stone inscription over a little pot-house, with a rose, carved in relief, gave the following quaint information:

"At the rose is the beste wine."
"Anno 1563."

tion, and looking down upon the town, had, in the course of centuries, lost nothing of its feudal character. Massive and heavy, this ancient edifice formed a perfect parallelogram, with five flankers: its battlements, beltings, and coignes, were of hewn stone; and its strength and magnitude were, as far back as Elizabeth, so formidable, that the queen was induced to think it too considerable an hold to belong to any Irish subject; and the lords of the English council transmitted an order to stop the works, which the Macarthy More of that day was carrying on for its completion. Shortly after, the chief of that family, with many of its immediate branches, were placed under the ban of royal displeasure. Forfeitures and deaths followed: some took refuge in Spain, the usual retreat of the persecuted Irish, and some in the less distinguished castles of their ancestors. The castle, town, and manor of Dunore, were given to Hildebrand, first Viscount of Dunore, a connexion of the great Lord Boyle's, by grant of James the First. This English lord completed the ramparts, which, under his jurisdiction, were no longer causes of jealousy. He also planted the ancient bawn,* made a stately avenue of trees from the town to its portals, and placed above the arch of its entrance, in letters cut in the stone, and still perfectly legible—

"God's Providence
Is my inheritance."

He had also, like his great kinsman, Boyle, endeavoured to turn the ancient catholic town of Dangan-na-Carthy (now called Dunore, or the "golden fort") into a protestant colony (7). But the inquisitorial zeal with which this attempt was pursued defeated its intent, and persecution produced fanaticism where it meant to effect conversion. He had also expelled the friars of Monasterny-Oriel, one of the communities, which, like many others, still subsisting in Ireland, had never been suppressed, and devoted its revenue for the pin-money of his daughter-in-law;* but still, from time to time, some of the order were found congregating among the ruins of the building, in obedience to the rules of the order, which forbid the entire dispersion of its members.

* The Bawn was an inclosed piece of ground, reserved for purposes of recreation and exercise, answering to the modern lawn. Swift's Hamilton's bawn was the remains of this Irish verger.

The first Viscount Dunore was the last of his family who had resided in the inheritance bestowed upon them by God's providence. One of his descendants, William, second Earl of Dunore, had visited it in a tour to the south, which he made during his vice-regency of Ireland. The present marquis, the eldest of two twin brothers, had early in life suffered his susceptible imagination to dwell on some affecting and curious relations of the ancient and actual state of Ireland. Impressions thus received, wrought on his mind with an influence proportioned to the unhappy malady which now first betrayed itself in many symptoms, of which his sympathy for Ireland, and his determination to reside in what he perpetually called "his beautiful castle," were deemed by his mother and friends among the strongest. With the uncalculating impecuosity of his disease, he had ordered immense sums of money to be expended in repairing and fitting what had become almost a ruin. Furniture, the most sumptuous and appropriate, had been sent from England; and even wine and plate had arrived, and been stowed in the long-unused cellars and buttery of the castle. Its lord and suit were daily expected, when his disease declared itself so unequivocally, that the promising but unfortunate young nobleman was placed in close confinement. Two years had elapsed since that event, and his mother, the Marchioness Dowager of Dunore, his sole guardian, and in whom centred the whole interest and influence of the Dunore property, had recently proposed visiting the castle, in order to set up her second son, Lord Adelm, who was abroad, to represent the neighbouring borough of Glannacrine; but on some representations from her agent, Mr. Crawley, and her lawyer, counsellor Conway Townsend Crawley, his son, she had suddenly given up the intention.

The castle, therefore, remained in statu quo, antique, superb, and desolate, such as may be found in every province of Ireland; the ancient residence of Irish chiefs, the quondam possession of English lords of the pale, the property of more recent patentees, the inheritance of English-Irish absentees, known only by name to the tenants they have never visited. The traveller paused a few moments before its walls, threw his eyes rapidly over the stately edifice, and then proceeded under its once fortified terrace, along the strand, to the monastic retreat of the learned O'Leary.

Monaster-ny-Oriel was one of those ecclesiastical ruins, in which the south of Ireland abounds; it was once of great extent, and was (in the terms of its charter) given to God and to St. John the Evangelist, by one of the chiefs of the Macarthy family. The windows and arches, still in preservation, were of beautiful gothic architecture, the walls of the choir remained, but it was roofless: and in the newly thatched chautrey of the blessed Virgin O'Leary held his academy, literally imaging Shakespear's description of a pedant keeping a school in a church. A tower on the verge of the ruins (once a small house for novices), hanging over the coast, was now called the Friary of St. John, where the order of the Dominicans was still kept up:* it was also the tenement now at O'Leary's disposal, through the kindness of its absent proprietor. Everywhere among the ruins, the tombs of rival chiefs were visible through the wild shrubs and furze that half concealed them. Here a 'GLORIA DEO IN EXCELSIS,' was raised for an English Boyle or Petty; there a 'GISTE ICI.—DIEU DE SON AME AIT MERCI,' for some Norman de Barri, or de Grosse; and above all rose the high grey stone, that in the ancient Irish character pointed to the resting-place of Conal Macarthy More, the swift footed, reposing in the midst of those who had opposed, or those who had betrayed him.

* There are many friaries in Ireland, thus preserved by the residence of one or two of the order, among the ruins of their ancient houses.
This scene, so solemn, even when tinged with the cheery lustre of the morning light, was most incongruously disturbed by the hum of confused and nasal murmurings, resembling the discord of an ill-tuned bag-pipe. The ear of the traveller seemed to recognize this sound, once, perhaps, well known to him; and directing his steps to the chauntry of the blessed Virgin, he perceived several students stretched upon the rank grass, before its high arched Saxon door-way: thus refreshing the picture of an Irish School, given by Campion in Queen Elizabeth's day. The ardent, but barefooted, disciple of the muses, now, as then, "grovelling on the earth, their books at their noses, themselves lying prostrate; and so chanting out their lessons piece-meal."

The breaking up of the academy took place as the Commodore approached it: a bevy of rough-headed students, with books as ragged as their habiliments, rushed forth at the sound of the horse's feet, and with hands shading their uncovered faces from the sun, stood gazing in earnest surprise at the unexpected visitor: last of this singular group, followed O'Leary himself, in learned dishabille: 'his customary suit,' an old great coat fastened with a wooden skewer at his breast, the sleeves hanging unoccupied, Spanish-wise, as he termed it; his wig laid aside, the shaven crown of his head resembling the clerical tonsure; a tattered Homer in one hand, and a slip of sallow in the other, with which he had been lately distributing some well-earned pandies to his pupils: thus exhibiting, in appearance, and in the important expression of his countenance, an epitome of that order of persons once so numerous, and still far from extinct in Ireland, the hedge schoolmaster. O'Leary was learned in the antiquities and genealogies of the great Irish families, as an ancient* Senachy; an order, of which he believed himself to be the sole representative, credulous of her fables, and jealous of her ancient glory; ardent in his feelings, fixed in his prejudices; hating the Bodëi Sassoni or English churls, in proportion as he distrusted them; living only in the past, contemptuous of the present, and hopeless of the future; all his national learning, and national vanity, were employed on his history of the Macarthies More, to whom he deemed himself hereditary senachy, while all his early associations and affections were occupied with the Fitzadelm family; to an heir of which he had not only been foster father, but, by a singular chain of occurrences, tutor and host. Thus, there existed an incongruity between his prejudices and his affections, that added to the natural incoherence of his wild, unregulated, ideal character. He had as much Greek and Latin as generally falls to the lot of the inferior Irish priesthood, an order to which he had been originally destined: he spoke Irish, as his native tongue, with great fluency; and English, with little variation, as it might have been spoken in the days of James or Elizabeth; for English was with him acquired by study, at no early period of life, and principally obtained from such books as came within the black letter plan of his antiquarian pursuits.

* The Seanachiæ* were antiquaries, genealogists, and historians; they recorded remarkable events, and preserved the genealogies of their patron, in a kind of poetical stanza.—Each province prince, or chief, had a senacha; and we will venture to conjecture, that in each province there was a repository, for the collections of the different Seanachiæ belonging to it, with the care of which an Ollamh-le-Senacha was charged: the ancient college of arms of Ulster is still maintained. Walker's Hist. of Irish Bards.

* The very common word, says Gen. Vallency, is peculiar to Ireland; It is, indeed, daily used in the corruption of Shan aos.—Och! he has fine old Shan aos, or old talk is frequently applied to, and family history, &c.

"Words that wise Bacon and grave Raleigh spoke"

were familiarly uttered by O'Leary, conned out of old English tracts, chronicles, presidential instructions, copies of patents, memorials, discourses, and translated remonstrances, from the Irish chiefs, of every date since the arrival of the English in the island; and a few French words, not unusually heard among the old Irish Catholics, the descendants of the faithful followers of the Stuarts, compleated the stock of his philological riches.*

* Several of the obsolete terms of Shakespeare and Spenser are to be found in daily use among the Catholics of Ireland. In the conversation of the higher orders, not unfrequently,

"A bold expressive phrase appears, Bright through the rubbish of some hundred years."

The strong line of demarkation drawn between the Catholic and Protestant gentry of the country, and which renders them a distinct society, explains the fact. Both in their speech
O'Leary now advanced to meet his visitant with a countenance radiant with the expression of complacency and satisfaction, not unmingled with pride and importance, as he threw his eyes round on his numerous disciples. To one of these the Commodore gave his horse; and drawing his hat over his eyes, as if to shade them from the sun, he placed himself under the shadow of the Saxon arch, observing,

"You see, Mr. O'Leary, I very eagerly avail myself of your invitation: but I fear I have interrupted your learned avocation."

"Not a taste, your honor, and am going to give my classes an holiday, in respect of the turf, Sir. What do's yez all crowd round the gentlemen for?—Did never yez see a raal gentleman afore? I'd trouble yez to consider yourselves as temporary. There's great scholars among them ragged runagates, your honor, poor as they look: for though in these degendered times you won't get the childre, as formerly, to talk the dead languages, afore they can spake, when, says Campion, they had Latin like a vulgar tongue, conning in their schools of leachcraft the aphorisms of Hippocrates, and the civil institutes of the faculties, yet there are as fine scholars, and as good philosophers still, Sir, to be found in my seminary as in Trinity College, Dublin.—Now, step forward here, you Homers. "Keklute meu Troes, kai Dardanoi, ed' epikouroi."

Half a dozen overgrown boys with bare heads and naked feet, hustled forward.

"Them's my first class, plaze your honor: sorrow one of them gassoons, but would throw you off a page of Homer into Irish while he'd be clamping a turf stack.—Come forward here, Padreen Mahony, you little mitcher, ye.—Have you no better courtesy than that, Padreen? Fie upon your manners. Then for all that, Sir, he’s my head philosopher, and am getting him up for Maynooth. Och! then I wouldn’t axe better than to pit him against the provost of Trinity College this day, for all his ould small cloathes, Sir, the cratur! troth, he’d puzzle him, great as he is, aye, and bate him too; that’s at the humanities, Sir. Padreen, my man, if the pig’s soul’d at Dunore market to-morrow, tell your daddy dear, I’ll expect the pintion. Is that your bow, Padreen, with your head under your arm like a roosting hen? Upon my word, I take shame for your manners. There, your honor, them’s my cordaries, the little Leprehauns,* with their cathah† heads, and their burned skins: I think your honor would be divarted to hear them parsing a chapter—Well now, dismiss, lads, jewel—off with yez, extemplo, like a piper out of a tent; away with yez to the turf; and mind me well, ye Homers ye, I'll expect Hector and Andromach to-morrow without fail: observ me well, I'll take no excuse for the classics barring the bog, in respect of the weather's being dry: dismiss, I say." The learned disciples of this Irish sage, pulling down the front lock of their hair to designate the bow they would have made, if they had possessed hats to move, now scampered off, leaping over tomb-stones and clearing rocks; while O'Leary observed, shaking his head, and looking after them, "Not one of them but is sharp witted, and has a genius for poethry, if there was any encouragement for larning in these degendered times."

Having now gratified his pedagogue pride, and excused the 'looped and windowed raggedness' of his pupils by extolling that which passeth shew, he now turned his whole attention on his guest, who stood shadowed by the deep arched door-case, waiting till the last of the boys had disappeared. O'Leary led the way before him into the interior of the chauntry, which was divided into the school-room, and his own abode; then laying down his Homer and ferule, and shutting the door almost to the exclusion of the light, and wiping down a seat with his wig, which lay on the desk, and which he afterwards placed on his head, he respectfully motioned his visitor to be seated. A silence for a moment ensued; when O'Leary, fixing his eyes into a look of expressive significance, observed, in a low cautious tone:

"I axe your lordship's pardon for the great liberty I took in calling you, Sir, my lord; thinking it due discretion so to do before my scholars; in respect of your intention of biding here in casu incognito.

"Indeed!" said the Commodore, starting on his feet: "for whom then do you take me?"

"For who you are—noble by blood, by birth, and by descent; and though no Irishman, but of Norman breed, a true Geraldine. And though the Fitzadelms are nothing to me now, for I have shook the dust off my feet at their threshold, and threw my ould couran* over the head of the last of the race, that shall ever give my heart a beat, or my eye a tear, yet I'd be sorry that it was to say, that a branch of the ould tree wanted a sheltering place, when I, Terence Oge O'Leary, the last Irish fosterer of the family, had a shed to housel him under."

"For whom, then," repeated the Commodore, in a calmer tone than he had before asked the question, "for whom do you take me?"

"For Lord Adelm Fitzadelm," replied O'Leary, with a respectful bow. "The cadet of the twin sons of Gerald Baron Fitzadelm, commonly called the Red Baron, himself the cadet of the father of the son, and heir that would have been if——"

O'Leary paused: his voice faltered; and after a moment's silence, the Commodore observed,

"It is strange that you should take me for the Lord Fitzadelm. For what purpose should he come incognito into this neighbourhood?"

"For every purpose in life, your honor, and the best of purposes, to circumvent them land pirates, them plot-hunters, them trianglers! them—them Crawley thieves. Bachal Essu! only let me live to see that day, and then doesn't care how soon I'm carried feet foremost to the berring ground of the pobble O'Leary, near St. Crohan's County Kerry: for its little else is left for me now to live for but to die."

"And for this strange tissue of improbability, what grounds have you, O'Leary? Why should Lord Fitzadellm come over in disguise to circumvent, as you call it, his mother's agent?"

"If you don't believe me, your honor," interrupted O'Leary, losing the supposed identity of the person he was addressing in the incoherency of his always confused ideas, "will you believe your own eyes, Sir; that's my Lord, I mane?"

He drew forth a letter from his pocket as he spoke, and the Commodore took it to the little casement, and read as follows:

"A distinguished looking stranger will shortly present himself to the learned and sagacious Terence Oge O'Leary: should he propose himself as a tenant for the Reverend Mr. O'Sullivan's vacant apartments, he will do well to accept him. Terence Oge O'Leary may have heard that Lord Adelm Fitzadelm will shortly be in the Peninsula of Dunore, to circumvent the machinations of the Crawley faction, and will there be incognito. None but the well-wishers of the Crawleys would refuse to assist Lord Adelm in a temporary concealment, necessary for the effecting of his laudable purposes."

After a frequent and amazed perusal of this billet, the Commodore demanded how this strange letter reached O'Leary.

"I found it," he replied, "after the dawn of day."

"Found it?"

"Aye, did I, troth, and marvelled much to see it fixed in the latch of the out-side door of the chauntry; and was mighty loath to break the sale, and didn't, only just skimmed round it."

O 4
The Commodore, on examining the seal, found it bore the figure of a child, plucking the thorns from a rose, with the motto:

Sou utile aindia que Bricando.*

"And have you no idea from whom this letter comes?" asked the Commodore, after another pause, and some evident perplexity of idea.

"I have, plaze your honor, that’s your lordship, I mane; every iday in life, it comes from the good people: often they do the likes of that kind turn by their pets—that’s the fairies, my Lord."

"In this instance, however," returned the Commodore, smiling, "they have done you an ill turn; for if they mean to impress you with an idea that I am Lord Adelm Fitzadelm, they most certainly deceive you."

"Oh! very well, Sir," returned O’Leary, with a most obstinate look of incredulity, "as your lordship willeth,

* I am useful in sportiveness.
that's your honor, I mane, now, Sir," if its Sir you plase to be."

"Supposing," said the Commodore, that even it were Lord Adelm who sought concealment under your roof, surely you would not defeat his intentions, by persisting in giving him a title, which would at once reveal his rank, or at least awaken suspicion."

"Is it me! och! I'd be very sorry! and will be bound, I'll never call your lordship my lord, if you was in it till the day of judgment, only when we are alone, Sir, and nobody by, barring our two selves, and can pass you as a tinnant come to bathe in the salt water, Sir, and need never name your honor at all, Sir, only pass you for my lodger."

"You will then pass me for what I am anxious to become, O'Leary; I will therefore look at the apartment you mean me to occupy. You shall name your own terms; and I dare say you have some old dame, who is wont to boil a chicken, and make coffee for Friar O'Sullivan, who would undertake—"

"Aye," interrupted O'Leary, eagerly, "and who can toss up an omelette, and fry a bit of fish on maigre days, your honor, and was taught by Fra Denis himself, who has a mighty pretty taste that way. Och! I'll engage we'll table your honor well. Here, Moriagh ma chree, throw me the keys of the friary."

As he spoke, O'Leary rapped at a little blind window in the wall, which was instantly opened, and discovered at once the interior of his kitchen, and an old woman employed in carding. "That's my Girleen," said O'Leary, taking a bunch of keys from her, and opening a door opposite to that which led from the road to the chauntry. The host and his new lodger proceeded across a sort of grass-grown court, surrounded by a range of cloister, still in high preservation, and bent their steps towards the friary. An old, and apparently very feeble eagle, with a leather collar round his leg, and fastened by a chain to a fragment of the ruin, attracted the stranger's attention. O'Leary paused also, clasped his hands, and sighed, exclaiming,

"You are not long for this world, my Cumhal honey, and leaves your bit of food for the sparrows, my poor bird, that daren't come near you once, my king of the mountains."

"He looks very sick, and I think dying."

"Oh! musha, the pity of him! He's ould and desolate like myself. It's twenty years and more since he came home to me in Dunkerron; and when he came in, with his looks all on fire, as he was wont after being out all day, Terence, my ould lad, says he, for that's a way he had of calling me, that's he that brought me the eagle, Sir, he that had the eye of the eagle, and the spirit of an eagle; Terence, my old lad, I have brought you another pet, says he. Do you mind, your honor, marking the word another, and maning himself to be one, the sowl! Have you, my lord, says I, for though he was then left to perish by his own kin, and was sharing my bit and sup, in the wilds of Kerry, I always called him my lord, as he was, or would have been; and did so that day 'bove all others, for he had scarcely a skreed of his ould red jacket left on him; and called him my lord, in regard of the jacket. Have you, my lord, says I; and Terence, says he, you'll be kind to this eaglet, (and it was fluttering on his left arm, with its blue bill and golden eye) you will be kind to it for my sake, and I'll tell you why, Terence, says he, leaning his right arm on mine, and looking with his smile, his mother's smile in my face. The poor bird has been driven from its parent's nest, says he, I found it fluttering on a bare rock exposed and perishing.
For it is the nature of the eagle to chase away its young, when unable to supply its own wants. For want, Terence, says he, may overcome even a parent's love. The tears stood in his eyes as he spoke, for it was his own story, plaze your honor, and it wasn't with a dry cheek I heard him. And yet, says he, cheering up and placing the fine young eaglet on the ground, the eagle is a noble bird, Terence, and even this poor fellow may yet soar high; though it isn't under a parent's wing he'll imp his flight. Them were his words if I was dying, and that was great speaking for a boy of twelve years old. But he had Homer and Ossian at his finger's ends, to say nothing of Don Bellianus of Greece, the seven wise maisters, and Plae racca na Rourke."*

While O'Leary was giving this history, the Commodore seem'd shaken by some deep feeling, which, however, was unobserved by O'Leary, whose attention was wholly occupied in striving to make the bird feed, while he described its first appearance under his roof. At last, by a powerful effort, shaking off his emotion, and giving a firm and indifferent tone to his voice, the Commodore asked, "of whom do you speak, O'Leary?"

"Of whom do I speak, your honor?" said O'Leary, raising his head loftily; "'tis of the Honorable de Montenay Fitzadelm I speak, that would have been Marquis of Dunore if he were in it the day, the only son and heir of Walter Baron Fitzadelm: it's of your father's nephew I speak, my lord," said O'Leary, with inveteracy, and raising his voice, "his only nephew, Sir; and such a nephew! and nothing to be got by it but a poor bit of a title in distant reversion! not a scrubal in money at the time, not a cantred of land then; it was for a sound, a breath, he sowld his sowl. But the curses that fell that day—" added he, closing his hands, and grinding his teeth, while he still seemed to struggle with feelings, which were giving the vehemence of insanity to his voice and its wildness to his look; when the Commodore, taking off his hat, as if to give coolness to his fervid brow, fixed his eye on him. O'Leary tottered back a few steps: his colour faded, his countenance lost its expression of fierceness; he several times drew his hand across his eyes as if to clear their vision; then stood gazing in silence for many minutes on the face of the stranger, which he now first beheld fairly revealed.

"You do not wish that the crimes of the father should bring curses on his children, O'Leary," said the Commodore, in a tranquil voice, "if indeed the late Baron Fitzadelm has been guilty of crimes which merit execration?"
O'Leary remained silent: his mind seemed in abeyance: every other sense was condensed in one: his lips moved, but he uttered no sound: he stood motionless, till his eyes, dazzled by the intensity of their gaze, obliged him to press his fingers on their aching lids.

"But," continued the Commodore, putting on his hat, and losing much of the character of his face by concealing its finest features, "but, O'Leary, if you persist in believing me to be Lord Adelm Fitzadelm, say, is the son a well-chosen confidant of his father's misdeeds? or if you cannot keep the secret of your own indignant feelings, how may I expect you will keep my secret? that is, supposing I were the Lord Adelm, or any other person, O'Leary, whose interest it is to keep their real name unknown till certain purposes be effected. The absence of discretion, O'Leary, may render even the zeal of affection abortive. But come, time wears, and time is precious: I will leave the arrangement of the friary to your care: I must now away to Mr. Crawley's. My host of Dunore tells me that it will be difficult to obtain an interview with your powerful portrieve after twelve: you shall shew me the way to Mount Crawley, and we will talk of the great Macarthies More as we walk along, the descendants of the Tyrian Hercules, the powerful chiefs of Desmond."

The spirits of O'Leary rallied at this watch-word of the imagination: he looked round as one suddenly awakened from some strange vision of the night, and mechanically followed the stranger across the chauntry into the cemetery of St. John's, where the boy, to whose care he had delivered his horse, was still leading it about.—"Bring your master his hat," said the Commodore, taking the reins of his horse. "You shall walk a mile of the way with me, O'Leary, and then return to your business, to which I must and am resolved not to be an hindrance."

The boy returned with the hat, which O'Leary suffered him to put over his little wig, now all awry. Plunged once more in deep cogitation, he walked silently beside his new tenant, snatching at intervals an eager glance at his person, and then shaking his head, debating as it were some point within himself; and at last clasping his hands behind his back, and exclaiming aloud, as he paced on heavily—"Sure kin may liken* kin; and no marvel in that, any how: only it all lies in the upper part of the face: and that was his mother's. The dark eyes, Milesian born. The great O'Sullivan Bear's daughter coming from the Luceni in Spain, of Scythian origin, and died of a broken heart, in the sorrowful chamber, so called to this day, only fallen to ruin, why wouldn't she, the cratur! and her own child first turning out to be Judy Laffan's; and then, when that wouldn't do, the country being well insensed* to the contrary, reported to be dead, and taken from her: and an hard case it was, as she said to my wife on her death-bed, God rest her: for they'd all deserted the court, barring the bailiff's for the execution, laying her to die with only the child's nurse to wet her lips. 'And a hard case it is to lose one child, Susheen,' said she, as she gave the prayer-book that had the certificate of Mr. De Montenay's birth and marriage in it, that's her own marriage with my lord, thinking, God help her, that it might be of use to the child one day (which it never will), and sending it to the friar Denis O'Sullivan Finn, her own kinsman at Dunkerron, for my lady was a Catholic by birth, and—"

"O'Sullivan," interrupted the Commodore, "is still in Cork, I suppose; but the book of course lost, if that were of any consequence now."

"He is in Cork, Sir, and will be till the visitation is over, and then will be in Portugal; and the prayer-book's safe. I saw it with him the day he departed; but what matter is it? Sure there is nothing to prove but that he was murdered fairly, that's drowned by force, vi et armis. I never will believe that he sunk when his boat was overturned. Is it he, that dived and swam like a duck? and often saw him, when nobody would venture out, cut his way through the wild waves that bate the grate Skelegs, and his cot overset, and a thousand ullalues raised from the shore, and he rise like a barnacle from the waves, and gain the land, and scale the stone of pain, as it's called, and reach the spindle, the pilgrim's last station, a bit of rock projecting over the raging sea, the storm bating wildly round him. Och! that was a great sight. Above the world he looked, and above his own lot,

"And he to be drowned on a fine, calm, moonlight night, when he went out to chase the porpoises; for that was great sport to him; and to fight the sea calves in the caves, under the headlands of Kerry; for he was never aisy but when he was after the seals and the say-dogs, that covered the rocks and slept in the sunshine; or else in the mountains; sometimes chasing the deer with their beautiful spotted skins, or coming home with a string of curlews on his back, baring when he was reading Homer and Ossian, and the Seven Wise Maisters."

"He paused, and again looked earnestly in the Commodore's face; who, musing, rather than listening to this apostrophe of O'Leary, was walking on with a slackened pace, the reins of his horse rolled round his folded arms, when he suddenly asked—

"And where does Mr. O'Sullivan live in Cork?"
"At the Franciscan Friary," said O'Leary: and then continued, with a deep sigh, "It's marvellous: and doesn't know where the likeness is with the hat on. Only it's the Fitzadelm mouth, any how—why wouldn't it? and minds, me of the Macarthies More, and Macarthies Reagh of Carberry, who were kin by blood as by descent, marrying through other, ever more, and preserving the family mouth always."

"Oh! by the bye," said the Commodore, abruptly, and throwing off his air of abstraction, "did not this district of Dunore belong anciently to the Macarthies?"

"Did it? Is it Dunore?—The Macarthies, kings of the Coriandri, of the ancient Desmonds, the whole province of Munster, late tyranni! See there, plaze your honor, behind you; that's Dunore Castle, the Dangan-ni-Carthie, the ancient fortress of the Macarthies; now an English pale castle, as I may say: and look there to your left, near the say, at the brow of ould Clotnotty-joy; do you see a fine ancient ould castle? Well, that's Castle M'Carthy, hanging over its depindency, the village of Ballydab, oncert a bishopprick and borough. The castle on a rock, an elliptical conoid, defended by a barbican to the right, and the hall underneath, where Donagh Macarthy held his last court-baron, and his tributaries resorted to him for suit and service, the pobble O'Keefe and the pobble O'Leary.”

“ I see nothing but a small square building on the mountain's brow,” replied his companion, in vain straining his eyes to view the features of feudal strength described by O'Leary, who saw only in the mind's eye, who now with all the associations of memory and imagination awakened, and with his wonted incoherence, launched into his favourite theme, for the moment forgetful of every other.
"There is the very gabbion Florence Macarthy stood on, when he saw the cannon planted against his only son, then in the Lord President's power, sending the warder word that they kept him as a fair mark to bestow their shot upon. But the constable returned answer, the fear of the boy's life should not make them abandon their country and its cause. Then the Lord President of Munster and his men intrenched themselves between the river here to the left, and the castle forenent you, and planted before it two demi-cannons, and one sacre. Then, Sir, begins the battery to play from the ramparts of the castle; and a breach is made, by a cave under the great hall, the English forcing the warder to the keep; the musketeers, followed by the halberdeers, making their way up the turret stairs, there to the left, the Irish pour down on them heart and hand, haeret pede pes densus que viro vir, man to man, breast to breast. Gal-readh-a... boe,* cries the Fitzadelms, who were in the English army below, encouraging their men that appeared on the ramparts above: Lambh-laidre-aboe, † shouts Macarthy More, from the postern, like a flame of fire, bearing down all before him;—the English retreat: the war-horn of the Macarthies is heard through the mountains; the Macarthies carry the day. Hurra! Hurra! Hurra!"

O'Leary was now waving his hat in the air triumphantly, and transported beyond the present moment, when "the vile squeaking of a wry-necked fife," and the roll of a drum, broke the thread of his ideas; and to the fancied engagements of the Irish and English cohorts of Queen Elizabeth's day, the gallowglasses of the Macartnies, and the bow-men of St. Leger, succeeded the Newtown Mount Crawley supplementary auxiliary yeomanry legion, a corps newly raised by Mr. Crawley, which stepped along the pathway of a very narrow road it nearly occupied, to the tune of "the Protestant Boys," that, on the appearance of O'Leary, was instantly changed to "Croppies lie down." To judge by the appearance of this evidently new raised corps, their leader, like Falstaff, had and whether it were, or were not, made up of "revolted tapsters," and "hostlers trade-fallen," its members presented a most unsoldier-like appearance. There gleamed, however, through their awkward gate, and clumsy carriage, a consciousness of superiority, perhaps, both religious and military, which gave the last finish of ridicule to their exhibition: take them altogether,

"No eye had seen such scarecrows."
The manner in which they had hustled O'Leary off the pathway, the well-known tune, and its well-known meaning, operated like a spell upon his agitated mind: he stopped short, till they had marched by; and then, wholly disenchanted from his splendid dreams, the Irish Macarthies, and the Norman Fitzadelms, vanished from his thoughts, and a third epoch in the history of his country was recalled to his recollection: this little image of local power, and petty ascendency, changed the current of his ideas, and with a deep sigh he added, “And now 'tis the reign of the Crawleys.”

“Then let us hasten to their court baron,” returned the Commodore, smiling, “or we may be too late for an audience, O'Leary.”

All the circumstances of the immediate moment now flashed full through the mental confusion of O'Leary. The anonymous letter, Lord Fitzadelm incognito, the circumventing, the Crawley faction, were incidents which rapidly arranged themselves in his imagination. Recovering his composure, his spirits, and his vindictiveness, he gradually assumed the shrewd, animated, and important look he had worn, ere traces of his former hallucination had been awakened by a supposed or real resemblance to the object, whose loss had, for a time, bereft him of reason: the idea that the stranger was the brother of the Marquis of Dunore had now taken possession of his mind, with all the pertinacity incidental to his former malady; and persuaded that the ruin of the Crawley faction, as he termed it, was at hand, he neither speculated, nor reasoned upon the probable means by which that event was to be consummated. His hatred of that family had its source in the strongest feelings, and most fixed prejudices of his nature; and, like the rest of his countrymen, of his own class, his revenge was proportionate to his devotion and fidelity. A few words, dropped at intervals, made up the conversation during the rest of their walk; he spoke of the stranger looking older than he ought, of his being "mighty tanned by foreign parts;" he asked if Mr. Crawley had seen him when in London, which being answered in the negative, he expressed his fear that a family likeness might be traced; and his hope that Torney Crawley would be caught by his lordship in all his glory; for this was one of his great days, when people came to him from all parts of the county for law, justice, and money.

"There is New-Town MountCrawley, plaze your honor," said O'Leary, pointing to a few slightly-built red-brick houses: "sorrow call there was, at all at all, for them slips of card buildings, only to crush the ancient city of Bally-dab, handy by. And there's the new barracks and the mail-coach road that is to be. Och! Musha, English barracks and a mail-coach road in Dangan-na-Carthy! When in Florence M'Carthy's time, the English sheriff daren't set his foot in the place, but the country round rose to oppose him; and all this now in respect of the jobs, and the patronage, and the protectees, taxing the country: and before that road is finished, which it never will, many a false oath will be sworn, and many a sowl lost, and many a poor man's cattle be driven; and for all that, I remember me the portrieve's father, ould Paddy Crawley, herd to M'Carthy, of Castle M'Carthy, there beyont, that's the late ould titular Earl of Clancare. And now, there's Mount Crawley, plaize your lordship, on the top of that green sod hill, once called the Thane's heap,* in regard of a Macarthy was slain there in an engagement between them and the Fitzadelms, about taking a prey of cattle, that's when the Macarthies' greatness overshadowed all the southern chiefs; and they made that day an elegant retrait through the pass of Mashanaglass, there below, to their own castle, as will be seen in my genealogical history. Sorrow much the retrait of Xenophon was in comparison to that of Mashanaglass: but now, Dioul! its the reign of the Crawleys.

At the gates of the principal entrance to Mount Crawley O'Leary took his leave, observing, that he had made a vow in the year of the rebellion never to cross the threshold of a Crawley, "till they had no longer a threshold to crass, plaze your Lordship." At the word 'Lordship,' the Commodore put his forefinger to his lips, and O'Leary, recovering himself, added, "your honor I mane." He then retreated, leaving him, whom he persisted in believing Lord Adelm, persuaded, that among his virtues, the "excellent quality of discretion” could not be numbered; and that this affectionate, but inconsiderate person, was the last to be trusted with a secret, in which his own strong and ungoverned feelings had an interest. He had in the course of his desultory and incoherent conversation betrayed circumstances detrimental to the family honour of the Fitzadelms, and which had long slept in oblivion; that Baron Fitzadelm had been reduced by his distress, and influenced by his brother, to conceal the existence of his son, in order to raise money on the little that was left of his estate; that he had afterwards yielded to the story suggested by his brother; that this unfortunate boy was not his son, but the substituted child of his first nurse, to whom O'Leary's wife had succeeded; that the boy had afterwards been sent to the wilds of Kerry, to his foster father, to be kept for some sinister purpose out of the way; that immediately after his father's death he was drowned by accident (though some told a different tale); that the herald's office had for some years after the death of the father and son refused to grant Gerald Fitzadelm the title of Baron Fitzadelm: all these circumstances, once the common topic of conversation in the province, had now died away, with the greater part of the generation who had witnessed them; and the details were only known to the few persons interested in their occurrence, and still surviving: these were the superior of the friars of St. John's, the old baccal of Lis-nasleugh, and, above all, the fosterer of the deserted and persecuted heir of Fitzadelm, Terence Oge O'Leary.
Note (1) Page 16.—This may seem harsh language applied to the "gallant Raleigh," who had rendered himself so illustrious in many instances, but it is fully justified by his conduct during his residence in Ireland, where he was little better than the captain of licensed banditti—the following anecdote is one out of a hundred to be found in the Irish tracts of Queen Elizabeth's day, which illustrates the truth of this apparently severe assertion.

"Soon after this action, Captain Raleigh, afterwards Sir Walter, went from Cork to Dublin, to his patron, the Lord Grey, who, on the Seventh of September, was made lord deputy of Ireland, with a complaint against the Barrys, (themselves descendants of the English lords who accompanied Henry II. to Ireland) and the Condons, for assisting the rebels." (These complaints were easily made, but rarely substantiated, and never inquired into) "He obtained a commission to seize on the castle of Barry's court, and the rest of Lord Barry's Estate, (on the strength of this complaint) and had some horse added to his company to enable him to take possession of it. But Barry having notice of it, set Barry’s court on fire, and the seneschal of Imokilly placed an ambush at Moore Abbey, which the young Raleigh courageously attacked, defeated, and broke through, so that he arrived safely at Cork. While Raleigh lay in this city, he performed several pieces of service against the rebels,* amongst others, Zouch ordered him (Ra-

* The rebels of those days were chiefly such men as Lord Barry, who, sooner than give up their families to massacre, and their property to plunder, set fire to their houses, and took shelter in woods and fastnesses, and their strong holds. With the exception of Macarthy-More, O’Neil, and O’Donnel, almost all the rebels of this day were of English origin, men who still inherited from their ancestors some recollection of Magna-Charta. They therefore resisted the effect of such complaints as Captain Raleigh, and either protected or burnt their castles, and were consequently “Rebels.” The persecution of the illustrious family of the Fitzgeralds, in the persons of the celebrated Earl of Kildare, and the great Earl of Desmond, whose crime was being the richest subject in the empire, are too well known to need comment. The Earl of Desmond, in an advanced age, was despoiled of all his property, hunted with bloodhounds through the woods and mountains, and discovered in a miserable hut, warming himself over a few fagots. His pursuers seized him by the long grey hairs; and to his appeal, “my friends, I am the old Earl of Desmond,” they replied in a very brief and decided manner—they cut off leigh) to take Lord Roche and his lady prisoners, and bring them to Cork, they being suspected of corresponding with the rebels—the seneschal of Imokilly, and David Barry, having notice of this design, assembled seven or eight hundred men to fall on Raleigh; either going or on his return. Raleigh quitting Cork, with about ninety men, at ten of the clock at night, marched towards Bally, twenty miles from Cork, the house of Lord Roche, a nobleman well-beloved in the country, and arrived there early in the morning. He marched up to the castle gate; whereupon the townsmen, to the number of five hundred, immediately took up arms. Raleigh having placed his men in order, took with him Michael Butler, James Fulford, Nicholas Wright, Arthur Berland, Henry Swane, and Pinkney Huish; and knocking at the gate, three or four of Lord Roche's gentlemen demanded the cause of their coming: to whom Raleigh answered, that he came to speak with their lord, which was agreed to, provided he would bring with him only two or three of his followers. However, the gate being opened, he and all the above-mentioned persons entered the castle; and after he had seen his head. The chief perpetrator was rewarded by the government with a commission and a pension, but was afterwards hung for some less horrible atrocity. For an account of this truly romantic tragedy, see "Smith's Cork." Lord Roche, and spoken to him, by degrees, and by different means, he drew in a considerable number of his men, whom he directed to guard the iron gate of the court lodge, and see that no man should pass in or out, and ordered others into the hall, with their arms ready. Lord Roche set the best face he could upon the matter, and invited the captain to dine with him. After dinner, Raleigh informed him that he had orders to carry him and his lady to Cork. Lord Roche began to excuse his going, and at length resolutely said that he neither would nor could go; but Raleigh letting him know that if he refused he would be taken by force, he found there was no remedy, and, therefore, he and his lady set out on their journey, in a most rainy and tempestuous night, and through a very rocky and dangerous way, whereby many soldiers were severely hurt, and others lost their arms. As for Lord Roche, he acquitted himself honourably of the crimes he was charged with, and afterwards did good service against the Irish."

It is notable, that "doing good service against the Irish," was becoming a plunderer in his turn, to avoid being plundered. It was thus the natives of the land were plunged into crime in self-defence, by the fatal policy which raised its power upon the demoralization of the people.
persecuted and brutalized; and England now complains of the want of principle and incivility of the Irish. The Irish, in their turn, may exclaim with Toney Lumpkin to his mother:

"As you made me, so you have me."

(2) Page 96.—Of the inextinguishable fire heretofore kept by the nuns of St. Bridget at Kildare, thus Giraldus Cambrensis. At Kildare, famous for St. Bridget, are many miracles worthy to be remembered, among which is St. Bridget's fire, which they call inextinguishable, not that it cannot be extinguished, but because the nuns and holy women, by a continual supply of materials, have preserved it alive for so many years since the time of that virgin; and though so great a quantity of wood has been consumed in it, yet no ashes remain. From hence that nunnery is commonly called the fire-house. But this fire was put out by Henry Loundres, Archbishop of Dublin, in the year 1220, says an anonymous author, of the order of predicants, who compendiously writ the Annals of Ireland, from the year of our Lord 1163 to 1314, wherein he lived.

honour of the holy-cross, for Cistercians, by Donald O'Brien, King of Limerick, about the year 1169, or as others, in 1181. The possessions were confirmed by John, Lord of Ireland and Earl of Moreton, afterwards King of England. This abbey was afterward, in a general chapter, subjected by the Abbot of Clarevaux to the Abbey of Furness, in England.

(5) Page 138.—"To the proper names of the ancient Irish, surnames were added, either from some action, some quality of the mind, colour or mark of the body, or from chance, or ironically. So Neal, King of Ireland, was called Vigialac, because he had taken nine hostages from the lesser kings, and had held them for some time in fetters. King Brian was called Boruma, because he had recovered from the people of Leinster a certain annual tribute so called. Caenfela was called the Wise. S. Barr, Finbarr, or White Barr. S. long beard: like as among the Grecians, Seleucus III. King of Syria, was called Ceraunus, that is thunder, from his precipitate temper. Ptolomy VII. King of Egypt, Physcon, from his great belly, and (to omit others) Ptolomy, the last save one, Auletes, from his great love to the bagpipe."—Ware.

"I return to Ireland, where, it is to be noted, that the ancient Irish, besides these surnames, had also, after the ancient manner, their fathers' names superadded, as Dermot-mac-Cormac, Cormac-mac-Donel, Donel-mac-Tirdelvac."—Ware.

Both these customs are still extant in Ireland; and even in the families of the provincial gentry, persons of the same name are distinguished by the colour of their complexions, hair, &c. &c.

(*5) Page 161.—This Irish Marmite formerly, and even within these twenty years, was open to any hand its plentiful contents might tempt. Now, however, the potatoe has risen in value with the increase of wretchedness, and of that, one meal a day is often with difficulty procured. In the summer of 1817, the author being in the country, within twelve miles of Dublin, on a visit at the seat of a person of rank, frequently observed that when the twelve o'clock bell rung to send the labourers home to dinner, they lay down in the dry ditches. On inquiring into the cause of a circumstance so unusual, she was informed, both by the peasants and their overseers, that being unable to procure more than one meal of potatoes, (taken only with salt and water), they preferred having that meal at night. Even this wretched supper is extremely scanty. Formerly potatoes (always the principal, or rather exclusive food) were sufficiently abundant in the poorest families. Now the father, or head of the family, is obliged to portion them out with great precision, lest an excess to-day should produce want to-morrow. Even in the neighbouring counties of the metropolis the unfortunate wretches are seen searching the ditches for offals or cresses; and many, to the author's knowledge, when she visited Munster in 1817, supported themselves by living on cabbage stalks thrown out from the great house of which she was guest. To such sufferers imprisonment or death can have but few terrors. In Dublin, persons, male and female, have been known lately to commit small depredations for the purpose of being sent to jail, where shelter, with bread and water, was provided for them. Two young women, lately brought before a most respectable police magistrate in Dublin, assigned the above reason for breaking windows. A few days back, July 9th, 1818, eight hundred persons presented themselves to the Mendicity Society of Dublin, to obtain any labour that could be procured them at the rate of sixpence per day. Such is the "flourishing state of Ireland," so often vaunted by English official visitors, who drive rapidly through the country, and are sumptuously entertained by the Irish officials, from whom they learn the little they return to describe.

(6) Page 231.—The ancient Irish used wicker boats covered with ox hyde, called corraghs, upon the open sea. Upon lakes and rivers they used another kind of boat, called cotta, made of a hollow tree. Both these boats are still in general use in Ireland, under the name of corraghs and cots, but are chiefly to be found on the rivers in remote counties, and on the south and west sea-coast.
